That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonoso-posed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotomia into Canaan;

The answer to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his

The answer to two more of the obiections, time was much impaired.

§. XIII.
That it is not improbable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so reuenged the names of the countries whence they came:
which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THE PREFACE.

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my selfe to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawning of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open its selfe to my younger years: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted this the darknesse of Age and Death would have covered over both. If and mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation; I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, within this one renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better suited with my disability, the better part of whose times are run, out in deeper traualles; or have set together (as I could) the romanced and faulter red time of our English affaires, than of the Primer fall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) then the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those many and soule-percing wounds, which at euery waking while concurred: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I have tryed by the fire of Adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading, haue calld me to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subject of euery opinion wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue I shewd that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity haue euery more tryed and varied vulgar Affections. And as we see it in experience, That does us alwayes hurt at those they know not; and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the confidante multitudes who, wanting this virtue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especial gift of G O D which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne without hear ing; and wound without offense. Hence led there vnto by vntrained rapacity; which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all liss. Blame no man (saith Strabon) before thou haue enquired the matter vnderstand first; and then resolve righteously. Rumor ressesse, fine iudice, maligne, fallax; Rumor is without wit, without iudge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion is writ, that gaur Saint Augustine Arguments affirme, that he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca, Consecratu satisfactorius: nihil in famula laboramus, sequatur vel malis, dum bene merearis. Let vs be silent for owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised for we deserve well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my private the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshime day to a Sea-man after shipwracke, & the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectata.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mislab in that kind; but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can swel the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise, and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Earth, & of that brau-guing life which God hath cast upon time & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read, & heare, and among those that are, whom we see & converse with, every one hath received a severall picture of face, & every one a diuers picture of minde; every one a forme apart, every one a fancy & cogitation differing there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall & unnatural; wise foolishly; manly, & childish affections, and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other: but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God, to reforme the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward workes of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) giue vs wherof to guesse at their selfe. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifye and make over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour; the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, can not long dissimble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometimes scene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selues to the Multitude, Omnis hominum animus iudicet vulgus: The common people are all Iudges of honest things, and whole Wisdome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort, every understanding hath hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censurath other men, & valueth it selfe. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my wartbles papers torne with Rats; seeing the stobfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the seuerest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the trusty valour and fortitude, with vaine glory. But of these natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since, & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neere as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge. That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time, which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and deuouring space of many thousands of years, & giuen so faire & peircing eies to our minde; that we plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei lapidinis opus, the wise works (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned: how it was couered with waters; and againe re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdomes, have flourished & fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one & the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-past miseries with our owne like errors & ill desertings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth peirce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalitie, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heathen wisdome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the cuerlasting god, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies, would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottome. The markes, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seen the fall of others, do not feare their owne faults. GODS iudgments vpon the greater & greatest haue bene left to posteritie; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to paym farre off, and to speake of the conuersion of Angells into Demills, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue enuaine the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in covering the Murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them-selues and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babilon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, &c. there left, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor leafe, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel flando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward & forraing force, or by inward negligence & dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest haue (such done vnder their own weight, of which Liuius hath a touch: eo creuit, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery Estate; before their first foundation and erection. But herof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolve.

The Preface.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue vnderaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iniustice, and cruelty; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp a-like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most necerly seemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwise best suiteth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vnchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long proceffe of time, and wont to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident prooffe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossest ouer each, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, so make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloued.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more then suspitious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle at then supposed to be liuing; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeed treason in himselfe, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this Iudge made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it other wise: though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it felow, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descents they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had bene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwayes tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Barres of Huntingdon and Kent, Montague & Spencer, who thought them-selues as great Politicians in those daies as others, haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure them-selues, by the Murder of Gloucester; died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents: Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, & his obtaining the Crowne traitorous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, professing to intend only the recouerie of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake a Faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that hee had enioyed this Realme some few years, and in that time had bene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies & rebellions: he saw (if soules immortal see & discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, & his Son the Prince, suddenly & without mercy, murdered: the possession of the Crowns (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, & by the Issues of his enemies worne & enioyed: enemies whom by his own practise he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse, by entailing the same vpon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no other wise, but that these cautious prouisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor, vnder the despaire of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Caesars also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamâtinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue beene founded & rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, vpon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers grievous faulces fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might haue defended his inheritance in France) & married the Daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that hee had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster; He drew on himselfe & this kingdome the greatest ioynt-lesse & dishonour that euer it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vn fort gẽtile Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vn fort mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death. Buckingham and Suffolke, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute: the Queene in respect of her personall wound, pretzque iniuria forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrel, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke; yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward, the son, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other then this, That she liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King, & her onely son the Prince, were heere in summer; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoiled of her Estate, and of her moueables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to become came a starke Begger. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides call-eth fine but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded since the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turne (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up; one only Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward (such a Plantation, as could any way promise it selfe stability) For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragickall Actours, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of God. In the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then he him-selfe had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sons & successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue fold the blood of others at a low rate; haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedie, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet he so well fixed euery affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly vpon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene, and to all her kindred, as he easily allured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Mother, and half brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: secondly, he wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads severed from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chief instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Devil hath written on euery mans breast, namely, To deresse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee vrged that argument so farre and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the yong king him-selfe, & of his brother, could saluum the conscience. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power; they would take a most sweet revenge of that euill selfe wrong offered to their Vncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when hee found by Caesars by who founded him, that he was not for dable; He first resolved to kill him sitting in counsell: where in hauing sayled with his sword; He let the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before hee ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this vpon Hastings. I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings him-selfe in the same day, & (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same law-lesse manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

The Preface.

But Buckingham liued a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts; being in the end betrayed and deliuered vp by his trustiest seruants; He had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himselfe after all these mischiefs & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion? after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperitie of so short a life, as it tooke end ere himselfe could well looke over and discerne it? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King Henry the 7. cut off; was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politicke Prince he was if euer there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beate downe & ouerturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the crowne, as euer King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he euer left the raines of his affectiō in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the eleuenth, whom he followed in all that was royall or royal-like; but he was farre more iust, and began not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could neuer endure any mediation in rewarding his seruants; & therein exceeding wise for whatsoeuer himselfe gave, he himselfe received backe the thanks & the loue, knowing it well that the affections of men purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits were traynes that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoeuer he rewarded his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How so euer, the taking off of Scanlios head, who at the Crowne on his, & the death of the yong Earle of Warwicke, son to George D. of Clarence, (he was the successe also did, that he held some of the errors of his Ancesters for his possession in the first line ended in his grāde children as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight; if all the pictures and Portraies of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted in the life, out of the story of this King. For how many seruants did he aduance to hast, (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers, from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the flue? How many wies did he cut off; cast off, as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood, (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue given his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own ho-now; & the Kings service; the other neuer hauing committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised, the other no lesse valiant than learned; & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped vpon the Fatherlesse, & widowes at home; and besides the ruaine enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more Treasures than all our victorious Kings did in their seuerall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell warres did he make vpon his owne Nephew King Iames the first? What Lawes & Willis did he deuise, to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? vsing his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their seuerall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified vpon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffused by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiestie now liuing, so long to liue, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if al the malice of the world were infused into one eie, yet could it not discern in his life, euen to this day, any one of those foule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled, nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stajned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England, it may truly be arowded: That he hath received it euen from the hand of God, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoeuer he were prouoked to hasten in: That He neuer tooker reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that were it long, with as great glory as euer Prince did. That his Maiestie entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall loue and Obedience, Hee was received. And howsoeuer His Maiesties preceeding title to this Kingdome, was perferred by many Princes (witnesse the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long reigne.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittain to the South, so wit of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brookes and banks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised vpon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiestie hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty greouances together; & heap them vp to their height, they will appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then, haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White; for the greatest happinesse; (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome received from GOD, certainly the peace betwene the two Lions of gold & gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceede the former: for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inabled to recouer her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the year 1588. ioynd the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; & had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is easie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this vniion a farre greater praise than it hath since cost vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Common weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world & not about it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cause, or to relieue euery mans wants. And yet in the latter, (thought to his owne preiudice) His Maiestie hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderstand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitudo of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Maiestie than of any King that euer England had; who as well in diuine, as humane vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, & withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters, which by her own commandement were knocked in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artits, in setting out the beauty of the externall: and weak writers in describing the vertues of the internall: doe often leaue to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely mindes, a most defectiue representation. It may suffice, and there needes no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell & turbulent passages of our former Kings; and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I haue inserted this breife discourse) with His Maiesties temperate & euengellisse, and liberall disposition: I say that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand: & withall but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King himselfe hath. Now as we haue tolde the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that GOD is euery where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the vsurpation, & vnnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders, vpon murders, poisoning, imprisonments, & ciuill warre, till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death; & of his bastard Brothers by a ciuill de ath (having inclosed them with sure guard, all the daies of their liues, within a Monastery) held himselfe secure from all oppositiō: Yet God raised vp against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him; to invade him; to take him prisoner, & to depose him; his owne sons, with whom (to satistie their ambition)

The Preface.

he had shared his estate, and giuen them Crownes to weare, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Yea his eldest son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first wife, & one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his depofition, that he had vsed violence towards his brothers and kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be slaine, eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus, et propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interficere permiserit. Because he vsed violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, & suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Assemblies of the States, it followes: Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, poenitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this he did openely confesse him-selfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius, hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did: and it was praise-worthie. But the blood that is vniuistly spilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue said, had foure Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gaue the Kingdome of Italy, as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second son he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whom hee had by a second wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles which, after the death of his son Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Gracious child bearing the same name. In the meane while, being invaded by his son Loys of Bauier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bauier, and Charles after wards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioyne in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the most bloody battaile that euer was stroken in France: in which, the maruailous losse of Nobility, & men of warre, gaue courage to the Saracens to invade Italie; to the Hunnes to fall vpon Almaine; & the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by reason seized vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster, Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eyes of his son Carloman; Bauier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastrie. Charles the Bald, the Vncle oppresseth his Nephewes the sonnes of Lothaire, hee resurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauier his elder Brother, Bauiers armies and his sonne Carloman are beaten; hee dies of griefe, & the vsurper Charles is perished by Zedechias a Iew his Christian, his sonne Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke Beque had Charles the simple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore: the son of Bauiere had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie; where with not contented, he invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, he dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his neck in chasing a Wolfe, & of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French makes himselfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after he had once appalled iustice with authority, his sonnes and successors tooke up the jacobin; and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable & naked beggers. The wretched success they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling than either God, or Justice had.

But to come nearer home it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fault) that ever the French men had, did never enjoy himselfe, after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrieres to the Parliaments of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt and murdered, men, women, and children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented him selfe of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, to do iustice upon the Murderers: shewing his sonne with GODS iudgments if hee neglected it. But this reasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry himselfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery, wee all may remember what became of his four sonnes; Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And not withstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve, the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were; and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscovia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having beene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court: as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom hee cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile, He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans; his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuges de Guzmá, Cornet, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gurtiere his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other, fourteene; he murdered them there. Ney he spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Deane to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobilitie; that came unto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his favour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assit the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having beene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Altramara, who disposed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had never beene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Cointance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Prê, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasure, and Request, (with fixtene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to governe, and to have mastered France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie in Anno. 14. 18.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor: & to fasten therunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no meanes left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied unto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out, and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne, the Prince of Spaine; he greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with child; with her continually birth, at once together buried. His eldest daughter married unto Don Alpho^o Prince of Portugall, beheld her first husband breake his necke in her presence; and being with child by her second, dyed with it. A iust iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished; who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Visco. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turned fooles, and died mad and deprauid. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eight, He saw cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; & the mother of a Daughter, that in her vnbappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maisters of a new name; and by a strange family are gouerned and possesst.

Charles the fift, son to the Arch-duke, Philip, in whole vaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almanes, & other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Capitaines were consumed: who gaue the while a most perillous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendom to be taken, was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug, and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions wherin hee consorted nothing (saw his owne disasters. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in eyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip, from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeeland, wrested by his ancestors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeesse; & to possesse in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of those countries; nor onely forgot the Present made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworn to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and fise Earles before him, Conditional Princes of those Prouinces: but beginning first to constraime them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intolerable impositions; he lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his formes Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of the warre & bloodshed since then;) and after he had tried what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the gouernment ment of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granuile; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinad Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaugtered that renowned Capitaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaure; & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn; made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those fixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eightene thousand & fixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garrisoned: Towards whose Pay & Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600 thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surprised the Citadells of Antwerp & Ne-meures: not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to haue possesse of all the maistring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer he ouerly pretended, He held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Elcouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny, formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this perurie, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in fixe yeeres, & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Child in Mecklin, Zurphen, Naerden and other places: & after he had consumed fixe and thirty millions of treasure in fixe yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish want, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no other wise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation, leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, then he found them at his first arriual. For Don Iohn, whose haugbty conceits of himselfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to manage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie & distrust; with the criminely death that seized him, euen in the flower of his youth? And for Elcouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England & the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, He was at the first arriual, & before any acceffe to the King by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warre than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, & successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid aboue an hundred Millions; & the liues of aboue four hundred thousand Christians for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuenue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despiight of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppress them.

The Preface.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtilty, have these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of G O D upon their selues, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and sent an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties; as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. G O D hath sayd it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or persuade our selues, that G O D hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shal be. It is true, that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabite it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts be also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost toucht as to inhabite, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Esai cryed out long ago, Lord, who hath beleued our reports? And out of doubt, as Esai complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleued, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniserall dissimulation? We professe that we know G O D: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitude non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neare driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Ime or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues were-nounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

The Preface.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the seruices of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the markes, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shooote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He hath had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the vse: When goods increase (sayth Salomon) they also increase that cate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde, leaving vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the fifth, after the resignatio of his Estates, stayed at Vlußing forwinde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires, and so did, notwithstanding al the resistence that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, He sayd thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time entroned with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domestick seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of G O D; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the euerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honor done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Mantaken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groomme beates the one, and a bitter contempt pursues the other, with equall liberty.

The Preface.

The second is the greatning of our posterity and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind vs. Certainly of those which conceive that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, & disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuientium non interfunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuersant with their affaires that remaine. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (sayth he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sun? He therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, so labour and trauaile in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof: which made me (sayth he) endeavour euen to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath preferred: mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Elai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But bereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawning, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy, nor any returne of foregone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retain any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; we shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, we shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euen detest their consideration. And what ouer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Piety, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall we therefore value honor and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnecessary & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees, which hath giuen greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betwene beausts and birds, created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub, and among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggerie: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pitty: I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quaesitas: so Ieremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrightheousnesse, and their chambers without equity: and Esai the same, Woe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that he commaunded vs, not to drinke the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them vp aliuie, who offer riches we couet: for such are the wayes (sayth hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it: hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when wee were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both so wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing: it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all foolles that cannot equall his abundance: the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodd downe their opposites: the Politician, as grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Nauigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad & seuer cogitations, formerly beaten fro vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that we cry out to God, for mercy; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is only then, that we are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mocked. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved; and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth vs, if we can but saluion in to the fount of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amend) is sufficient? O quam multi, sayth a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad aeternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended wel; for we al desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall wee call a dissembling, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiveness for leishure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breaht? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth? We beseech thee O God, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leishure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God; or made One: and in all likelihood (such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practise of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euermouing God. But of this composition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is durelesse and ridiculous; they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their verry whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon shadowes: they slauer and forsake the prosperous and vnpromperous, be they friends or Kings; yea they diewnder water like Ducks, at euery pebble stone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slauer towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched; we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other so tied by God to the verry instant, and both so subiect to exchange (witness the sodaine downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy yprifing of the meaneest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honor, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the verry next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vchat, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet yee cannot tell (sayth S. Iames) what shal be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersities, be verry obscure; yet therein ye better discern the God, than in that shining light which enuironeth worldly glory; through which for the clearenesse thereof, there is no vauing which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the verry instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we

haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all we haue reioyced; or be it that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other so with the ioy and the weale, sayled out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chace from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat retro est, morstener: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it. So as who so-euer he be; to whom Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved eyther of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saued, that it might last of his dearest affections, or of what euer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnualueable; and he shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-spring youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it vnto the verry instant, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking backe from the verry instant time, & fro our now being, the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures & delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, acceptfull hope hath it. Omnia quae euentura sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who haue had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well led life, behold death without dread, and the graue without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Erit iustus in omnibus qui veniunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if he had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; for getting that humble & iust acknowledgement of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a foole or vngatefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meane soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse; than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare the, but as the tributes of offinding. He ought to beare them manlike, and resolutely; & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem. For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemy to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Sapore): that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Capitaine; & lastly the part of a blinde begger; of which examples many thouands may be produced. Why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknes prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Adversitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinkes but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristitius est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued me to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things, to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neare, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: Creation, inferring Providence (for what father forsakes the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God) be so weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, y^e which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleued, had not better informed him; is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrenched their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heauen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed, indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it selfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same in euery question of Nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of charren de wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorite quel' autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Euery humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But herof how shall the upright and vnpartiall iudgement of man giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine vilo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgement approve the inuention of those that fore-went them; & suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophie, Physick, and Diuinity, in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shut vp all light of Learning within the iamborne of Aristotles braines: or that it was ever said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Cordo tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heaaben, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottome thereof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sourenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophie, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who canot giue a true reason for the Grass vnder his feete, why it should be greener rather then red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heaauen themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & effect, telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; rob. 26.

The Preface.

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man kinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the mothes of the Aire for a cause, cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatorum haue maintained it; parati ac coniuati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuiditis opinionibus tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Streuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessitie of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Proëdrietam vnam esse consentiant siue enim Natura, siue Aether, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex, idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (asith Laëtiū) though vnertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Providence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the same which we call G O D. Certainly as all the Riuer in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some times hide themselves for a while vnder ground, yet seeme to be lost in Sea-like Lakes, doe at last finde, & fall into the great Ocean; so after all the searches that humane capacitie hath, & after all Philosophicall conuemplation and curiositie; in the necessitie of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue bene eternal, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the Suppositio is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (asith Eufebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance. He had neither bene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternal: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit it selfe to God, or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applied himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he liued vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; & no more, nor no lesse, than seru'd to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as seru'd to finish the worke of the World. Or had there bin more of this matter than sufficed; then God did dissolve & annihilate whatsoeuer remained, and was superfluous. And this must euery reasonable sonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest id oisims. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saie this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part; who soeuer will make choice, rather to beleue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as waterh teares to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos; qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe; either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if such had bene Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. Th y are Dionysius his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causaliter, or in better teares, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed up all of G O D: For the most part of his workes (asith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious worke of the world, which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hence of it comes; That wee seldom entitle G O D the all shewing, or the all willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so saluage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, imposed vpon Natural Agents and finite power; That out of nothing nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, & omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of fallhood, to conclude falsely; than out of truth, to reioine truly. For if wee compare the world vniuersall, and all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himselfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuersal, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it selfe; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, proueth this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; so wit, the world vniuersal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, so to esse a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion; so to make God free in power, & bound in will, able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but worke matter being present; as fit, so burne things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke; if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (sayth he) is immouable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwayes worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be sayd to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, Spirituale mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idæa and Creation in time. Spiritus ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æqualis est Archetipo, fuit semper cum illo, critque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the famplar of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Archited; for it was for euer with him, and euer shal be. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other wise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shal be a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this consideration of an eternall and vchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

The Preface.

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissippable) is continued, & knit to the Diuine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from diuine vinity; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God (he wit, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that, this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (sayth he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively euery moment by little & little; euen as the whole Material World is not altogether, but the abolished parts are departed by smal degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same smal degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, and to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they bene subiect to finall corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniecture all arguments may receiue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Sirabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burne Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heat; neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent beate.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter molding and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleueed, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes and Rockes, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Celestiall and quintessentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Summe, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Againe, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progreffe once in every year: the Moone to live by borrowed light: the first Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Naitles in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Love that the Sunne by his perpetual trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited giuen light vnto, and releined all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternitie: He may iustly be called eternall Charity, and euerslasting Love. The same may be sayd of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall verities: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleue againe in the old Play of the gods? Tea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesioidus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; that the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit. Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles physicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academics open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodians; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath a-doubted. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facilius quid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere; sublata vero mediõrũ materialiumq; diuersitate, vel vnicũ, vel simplicium limum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heaven and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnesq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in teame. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will, and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth al: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto al, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supreme power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which is hath, doth yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine Letters, as the waters of a running river do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

This much I say it is that Reason it self hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religio follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (sayth Iudore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgement, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione infirmum, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonor (sayth a French Author) de faire arrester aubut qu'on nauecu surpasseur, For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, is acknowledged it to be so; as vnderstanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his owne Art. For seeing both Reason is Necessary teach vs Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessary make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleefe hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

I haue bene already ouer long to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the vsuable diuision of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first parts finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euery of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it suites well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto subducimur: We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleue as he doth; that who so thinks himselfe the wisest man is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take vp the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity. Some few enterprises greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot vp here and there in the same time; I am driuen to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government: they had Kingly rule; Nobility, Policy in war; Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath bene taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But we still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy producing Actions of more importance then were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty then the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, whose first beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was knowne of them from their seuerall beginnings in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies; which in the end swallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, iyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become vnted, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weaker, the stile not euery where like it self: the first shewes their legitimation and true Parent: the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili aucta, vsed stronger pipes, when he founded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Character in S. Senensis; and of the rest I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither yet were it not to be wondered at, hauing had a eleven yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Hooper, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine owne times, having bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that who so ever in writing a moderne History, shall followe too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe: and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Baseness. It is true, that I never travailed after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them: and I have now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of excessive ambition, or excessive cowardise, or both, do yet, when death hath them on his shoulders, flatter the world, betweene the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and take the voices of those that are yet living in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting the our aneu; they shall therein accuse themselves; justly, & me falsely.

For I protest before the Majesty of God, That I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their private passions; but that they seeme diuers persons in one of the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: *Vnus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnderooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which al that is presented, hath received both blowes and thanks, *Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quo his secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malicia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; & therefore have not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Natural priuation there is no reason to haue; so it is seldome seene in the priuation politike. I do therefore forbare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, al the hope I haue lies in this: That I haue already found more yngentle and yncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall do againe. For had it bene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leasure, to haue made myselfe a foole in print.

INTREATING OF THE BEGINNING, AND first Ages of the same, from the Creation, VNTO ABRAHAM.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the innisible God is seene in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power vncfeible, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie innisible; an Understanding, which it selfe can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee imbraceth, fillet, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his mercifull prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; Celestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Mouer.

In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witnesse in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules: for according to S. GREGORY, omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob,) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conficere in creaturis, To discern him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath bene otherwise seene, so wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstanding, ding, grounded on these places of S. John, and S. Paul, Tee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue ye seen his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see. And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Eusebius, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and Planets, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cvsanus, Mundus vniuersus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God exprest. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are scene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and patterne of these his Creatures, as hee beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged Will mooued, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his almightie Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neg enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosci, potest, sed vel ex rerum, que facte sunt, quod sunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verba: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue beene created by God.

His worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner exprest, I meane all those who are entituled by S. AVOVSINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The originall of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Aetius, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein hee truly, with S. Paul, casteth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almightie Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heracitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is vsed) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkable words are thus conuenced: Cum abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hidden all things in himselfe, working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into greatfull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought. Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Primus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forraine testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so Saint Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember what himselfe had found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus, he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menaander, and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever vntured, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas a quocumque dicatur, a Spiritu sancto est; and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule, Quae sacris seruiunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holiness.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes 1. 1.

His visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Terrestrial) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Iews Targum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent: but onely to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Laurentius) as exceeded God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faue a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam quilibet de se more suo alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Genesis 2. 1.

The vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuersly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those words, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, per nulla rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without formes, which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Lyranus, Concensor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Emphyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Emphyrean Heauen Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and venerat: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather sayled in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seate of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternal Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, Psal. 104. 1. that couerth himselfe with light: and in the Revelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God doth light it. And herein also Iohn Mercer vpon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall; so in his iudgement, because it was in all Eternitie, the glorious seate of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercelestem meo iudicio creati (saith Mercer) non erat necess.

But as Moses forbore to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the

the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Vniuersall, so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercellstiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate & eternal: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the feare of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possessions: it is great, and hath no end, it is high and vnmeterable.

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, aswell of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive possit fieri. Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, as by Moses vnderstood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of enformed and voided, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heauen.

Moses first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them a part, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aquae ad secunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulnesse.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters; all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith Dauid) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished, but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Initio tu Domine terram fundasti, T thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beautie and ornament. Calum vero & terra instructa creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be vnderstood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifically waters; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua pluralis numero a quo fit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters. This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornement. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Ea perfecti Dei perfecti sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon: Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

Vnus erat toto naturae vultus in Orbe, Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one onely face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to bee vnderstood that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters, and that this is not to bee searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters. The Seventy interpreters vnto the word superferebat, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab auisus pullitiei sue in cubantibus, quamuis spiritali, & plane innarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spirittuall and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect; Spiritus Dei voluit ab; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldaean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sufflabat: or as after vnderstand the Chaldaean, Flabat, peltebat, remouebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, drive, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalme, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation.

Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elobim iterachset, id est, efficaciter mouitans, conuolens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, wherof three are agents; and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: lebi, which is, fiat, fuerit, Let it be, or it shall be. Que vox verbo Dei prima predata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God.

The third, Spiritus Elobim, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quaedam diuina, agilis ac presens, per omnia peringens, omnia complectens, that is, A certaine diuine power, or strength euery where, active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become euery thing. For my selfe I am resolved (Cum Deus sit superrationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner & first operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body.

Animals homo que Dei sunt non percipiunt: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. Paut) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitalitie and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For, how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiquties) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominem, distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius manifestis eterne, cogitatio assequeretur hominibus: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could conuenie the counsels and disposing of these eternall Misericordies; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gaue forme to the Matter of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safeoord, will presume to passe ouer the greatest Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDVA, Via causa efficiens; The force of the efficient cause, S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Terentianus and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: AMAXAGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world: and in his sixth Booke de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heauen; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde sayeth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but euen the voice of Angels: so may all men do else say in the vnderstanding, and vtturance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for which he can, Sed consubstantialis illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est; What seuer attribute of him there is, and what power he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

But the Spirit of God which moued by the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustayneth, and giueeth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things; saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum desueneret vniuersa; God giueeth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

*Principio Cælum ac Terras, camposq; liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Lunæ, Titaniasq; astra, Spiritus intus alit: totamq; infusa per artus,
Mens agit atq; molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole masse,
A Mind, which through each part infus'd doth passe, Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuersall.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued upon the waters, and created in them their Spirituality, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, so while it moued upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtil, diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Agnis à Deo insitam, ex qua aqua non solum motum, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerim. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and diffinitude of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vnting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be light in the Firmaments, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished: after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the sixth Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are light/some (though it make it selfe, & all things else visible) but a body most illighened, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Ether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our Aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conductor, and preseruer, or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing defending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Auente lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporeall, and so doth MONTANVS, Cuius diuinitas resissit, nec spaium; Which neither hardnesse resists, nor space leaueth.

Aristotle findeth corporallitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, Via de finib. Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Crystalline matters; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vapure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obstatulum naturæ terreum atq; solidum, non capit candidum luminis puritatem; Decaused an obstacle, by nature earthy and soule, doth not receive the pure cleanness of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyrannus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtil in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientia odiosius acuminis nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, which the same time hath brought brought forth and deuoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporeall: Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire illuminated: incorporeall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers fo esteemed: others say, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obayne their fo being of the light; and therefore, if wee deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my understanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentionall Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining 20 which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentionall Species thereof; and an intentionall Species may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceive the same colour cast vpon any thing opposite, which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and vnderstanding order, which God obserued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: 30 for Moses repeateth twice the mayne parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused, and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncouered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vntuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnited, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obayned life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should mooue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite eury part of the inferiour world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue 50 aduantage to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordaind; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Ion, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdras). And those which inhabit the Heauens, doe only know the Essence thereof. *Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in Heu. mundo inuisibilia, in mundo visibilia umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes: Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporality, then of all other the most subtle and pure; for how soeuer, it is of all things scene, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministrerth to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it dissipaterth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetheth and maintaineth; it discouereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually traile to surmount these percieued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis: Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus comunicet: It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which I did out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Atundi oculos.*

Ouid. Met. 1. 1.

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be percieued. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be the Light, which lighteth 10. 1. 9. & 14. 46. in every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus perfectio uon mens est, at vero ut sit mens causa est, nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickened; and the Waters hauing now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illuminated: 40 the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth seede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vnited, and gaue it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those seuerall Species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Vatilius, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heauens, created in the imagination of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against against this fancy. For the waters about the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the nether waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Bakingh, and Shamaym, being indifferently taken for the Heauen and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Aether, then for the Heauens, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them. Quo suprema ac tenuis ab inferioris crebris ducta, intercellat, distarant, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the Firmament, expresse in the word Majm, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalm. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and * upon Sedon and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to Isaac, God giue thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possess it, is a land, that drinketh water of the reyne of Heauen; and in Iob, Who hath ingendered the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great heigh, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basil auoucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocante Deus firmamentum calum. Hæc appellatio alijs quædam proprie accommodatur, hinc autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude; and if there were no other prooffe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heauen, the words of MOSES in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen. And what use there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this heipe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and saith it selfe (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conducter, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Oronius; and of this waterie Heauen, Basilius Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and fixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters about the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendered in the vppermost Ayre.

¶ I. X.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise Gods in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their feedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preferred.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor formes the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

NO for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euerie creature, having no other seite-abilitie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which allo directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by seuerall Organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerie where-prefence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertlesse, and dead: of which excellentie ORPHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable verities which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inuenienda veritatis hinc studio subiceretur, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenijs in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vna re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing wer to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take conference, it hath not bene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimitur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be sub-icium formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betweene matter and forme, then betweene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AVGVSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seedes of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; estimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum est, formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not therunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Lucretius:

Sernis regna dabunt, captiuus Fata triumphos.*

*Gaiust Fate no counsell can preuaile.
Kingdomes to Slaues by Destinie,
To Captiues triumphs giuen be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiaall Orbes, vniuersally working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rational minde doth nor order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertaine by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alwaie keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, wee may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (guen for euerie Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but other wise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vnumcountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. Gen. 1.5. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syrracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then these be, and we haue seen but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacite of men, wee know somewhat, yet in the true and vttermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our selues sow and set, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiaall bodies. for hardly (saith Salomon) can we discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuestigate the things that are in Heauen? Alutsum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a litle of beauenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiaall inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustifiable: of whom Saint AVGVSTINE: Impiè peruersitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctore gladium, quam commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruerseesse urge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestiaall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also firred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith DAMASCENE) constitunt in nobis habitum, complexionem, & dispositiones. The beauenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habitus, complexionem, & dispositiones: for the bodie (though Galen enforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in vertues; for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the minde hath no reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind I am resolu'd: For of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiaall bodies (as instruments and Executioners of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who litle differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincis si contempseris: Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect it, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilibus corporum confert; & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AVGVSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonum quidem est sol, in ministerio, non imperio: The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And Saint AVGVSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but hee auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Iuuenis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertues, and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthie sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiaritie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retaine a savour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet savour of vertue first receyued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a virtuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the feedes of vertue may by the art and husbandrie of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautiful fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yielded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a soyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more vsfull and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientia adiuvabit opus agriculturæ, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientia, & omnia sapientia medici dominabuntur astris, A wiseman, and the omniscient art of a wise Physician shall prevail against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Uniuersal, whose influences may be called his reserved and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodnesse, and charitie itselfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Sauour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliver vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependence, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope! And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion over his creatures; be hee Pagan or Christian that so beleuereth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginatie gods of the other would thereby be depoyled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finished the worke which thou gauest mee to doe); and the same God, who hath threatened vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs inevitably to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Ptolomus, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vntersle: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and prouidence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receiue influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie; and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Prouidence, Prefcience, and Predetermination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

§. XII.

Of Prefcience.

Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prægnosis, the Latines Præcognitio, or prescientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Prouidence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succcede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowledge impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall feedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yer is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith Boetivs) beholdeth these things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne naturer. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina prouidentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitates, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & poena malorum periret; Diuine Prouidence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil.

Boetius de con-

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

Now Prouidence (which the Greekes call Prœnoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely be- hold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefcience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Prouidence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for prouident, as, remembering things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeding. That such a thing there is as Prouidence, the Scriptures euery where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hereof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Prouidence of God: yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prouing prouidence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which couereth the Heauens with cloudes; and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Ravens that cries: All these wait vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the River Cheareth (saith God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbered: And S. PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his iudgements are written, saith DAVID.

1. Cor. 13. 24.

God therefore, who is euerie-where present, who filleth the Heauens and the Earth, whose eyes are vpon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not giue my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euerie-where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is scene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children: beafts and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beafts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whole Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuinus re- rum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq. eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuersa machina fundamen- tum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the im- moueable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to euerie-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute transcendent habilitie of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

§. XIV. of Predestination.

Now for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Prouidence and Preseence, then in this, that Preseence only fore-seeth: Prouidence fore-seeth & careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the bright- est Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthiest Wormes of the Earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belong- ing, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fa- thers take it more largely sometimes; among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Ci- ties, and two Societies, vseth these words, Quarum est vna, que predestinata est in eternu regnare cum Deo, altera eternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euil lasting torment with the Demill: for according to NOMINUS MARCELLVS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmi- tatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the acti- ons of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceiueh the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AUGUSTINE, Occulta esse causa potest, iniusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vniust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and againe Reason and Prouidence.

Firstly, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subsequent to Gods prouidence, and see- ing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificium Dei Orga- num; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of I- dolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune, or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reueren- ced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Asiemiacs. The Greekes call her Tyche, signifying a rellative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward the grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, reuising the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the Sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which * PALLADIVS, Vita hominum lu- dus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often filleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement con- ducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenaeus

Longissimi à Sapientia Fors distidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen similitima:

From Wisedome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and en- deauours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cuius causa legitima non preceperit; Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sonne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distin- ction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which hap- pen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris. (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Postea fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God, and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby a- nother is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this acci- dent to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect; That the same power which they cal- led animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, governing euerie being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of Ne- cessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the stile of For- tune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect spea- keth S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsaener (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he vseth, and exerciseth his power diu- sly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the cau- ses of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe; how comes it then, that so many worthie and wife men depend vpon so many vnworthy and empy- tie-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without ker- nell:

nell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and detected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our felues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whofoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euer more hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deferring well and receiuing ill, we alwaies fally charge Fortune withall. For whofoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the succesor, if he be of contrarie qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obsequant slavish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them beleue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dutie actions crytalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Enrie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applaue: so as whofoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obserue them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the author of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

*Quidrem am.

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world began not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTVS, Paruisses (saith PETRARCH) in leclule suo mori, postmiste integro cadangre sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vnborne and vndiscovered bodie buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (presertim de effectu) litibus perperuis implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be entangled with endlesse contentions? Whosoever therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shooe at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first desired to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did eyther for proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sailes, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sailes and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoeuer so Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolue with S. PAUL, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things; and we by him; there are diuities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

HHe creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likenesse. Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingen miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCVIUS:) Natura ardentissima artificium, The artificiaill worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie external, but in respect of his internal forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortal, and spirituall; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more,
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Vt sic Deus vnus, ab eo fieret homo vnus, & quomodo ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine vnus Deus esset super faciem totius terra: Vnus igitur vnus fecit, qui vnitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortal soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortal and incorpall, so is the soule of man immortal and incorpall; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the lewes make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betwene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differencates, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost; and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betwene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinn into small threads, with subtile distinctions, many times the plainnesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Visiorum also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratum; A word declaring qualitatem in substantia. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inter'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the sinfull soule doth northerfore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Refractations maintayneth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we beare the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrarie. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these words: Therewith blest we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancie in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consecratur imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi uero posuit esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the first Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created ADAM, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syrrides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No pars in aman (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE), Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humana forme particeps, neque corpus humanum diuino. (saith PHILO), God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine persansit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the verie essence and Maieutie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitable it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexcoigitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Demonēs, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtilitie; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vels beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenaeus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderstood it better, with Syrilla: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creator, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who herin came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne image and similitude; and REYNERIUS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Regn. de ment. Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

But Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truib; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectuall contemplatiue, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellectuall minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CYRANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee esteemeth it to be the verie essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCURIUS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; or the lumen animae rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens others call animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptracle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amore sapientiae tanquam ducē sequitur, Which followeth after after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, between which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discoufse; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueth his life: for death is the separation of body and foule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perficietiam animae partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima sopiuit; & in fructibus mens extinguitur, anima manet. In mens that sleepe it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the mind or soule, which reflecteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, Erin mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life is attributed abusiuely to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (minde) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind : and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or a man of a iust minde : sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination : sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discoucourse : oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences : but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object : or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion comming from without , and apt to bee diffused, as, eternall from that which is mortall, Hereof excellently MERCURIUS : Animæ effigē imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus mentis præsens, mens animæ, animæ corpori : The Soule (meaning that which giueth life) is the Image of this vnderstanding , or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuision and distinction

Discourse in the said Reply of M. D. Bhion, ante maris Howeuer the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mindeit selfe by which we live, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God: But most faistly may we relembr our felues to God in mente, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which being

being added to the nature, effence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propria imago Dei est, quia sui memini Meus, scq̃ intelligi & diligi (which also was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) [sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere cum a quo facta est, (that is) The mind (or Meus) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth its self, but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformavit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentia affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of GOD, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it unprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by itselfe, nor in all these ioynted, by any of which, or by all which we relembr, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioynted to the soules part of the Effentiall 20 Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunke of Dutt and Clay, the inimitable habitacle of his owne Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long re- Gen. 5. 22
tayne this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruiſe and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obſtinacie finnes. For the vniuit minde cannot beate the Image of God, ſeeing God is Iuſtice it ſelfe; The bloud-thiſtfe hath it not; for Gods Charitie, and Mercie it ſelfe: Falſhood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Sathan; and therefore cannot dwell in one ſoule, together with God; and to beſſhort, there is or betweene righteouſneſſe and reprobation. And though Nature, according to com- 2. Cor. 5. 14

God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanſhippe of Gods Wiſe-by Saint Ambroſe, with whom Saint Ambroſe ſayeth, that by ſinne, the perfection of the Image is loſt, and not the Image it ſelfe; both opinions by this diſtinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes S. Ambroſe of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terre, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghashpar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & molissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made self, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in hum- 10 ble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, I, that am but dust and ashes: And In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabit, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery-where behold the sudden and restlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assure vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Andulles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hues of vnumbrable cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true vnhappyneesse of our condition; and the darkignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, 20 pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches, whiles our strength enable vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hareth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must gosse the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made 30 ready for vs in the darkes; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past; and withall this terrible Inscription: Thus God will bring euery worke into iudgements, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue euer moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which wee only see) doe neither looke vp towards termelesse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently 40 Marium Victor:

Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, qussu periculis
Tentati, nibilo meliores reddimur vnquam, Sub vitij nullo culpamur sine manentibus.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same sinare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frastra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, whicthin this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercie.

§. IV.

§. IV.

of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcasie God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELI IN IOB) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, id est forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus suis labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudine, quia solent homines operari, loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggerliness of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands haue made me, spake thus Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the callome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hys, qui Scripturas sensu corpore legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que vivificat corpus, & animat, Which doth animate, and giue life to the bodie. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable Soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the bodie returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus, receive my spirit: and in S. IOHN, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue vp the ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let us make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life: so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, when they were taken: but the life of breath euertlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortallitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God 50 created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, he vouchsafed vnto Man both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man, and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE): Homo est virtuosus, natura vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alteram quandam mundum, durum, in breui magnum, atq. exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heauie and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Ouid. Met. lib.

Inde genus durum sumus, experientisq. laborum, Et documenta damus, qua sumus origine nati:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which disperfeth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brookes and Riues ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitye of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which adorns or ouer-shaddows it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vn certaine winds; our ries, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce pusses of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the tide of his owne image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betwene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteousnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which wee beginne to take account of our times, iudge of our felues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deere and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vnsofiable to others, we become a burthen to our felues: being of no other vse, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwaies traueil both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Streame, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fallen, springeth no more,

neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leaues and flowers.

Redditur arboribus florens reuertentibus ætas, Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, reddit.

To which I giue this sense,

The Plants and Trees made poore and old	But neuer Man repayrd againe
By Winter enuious,	His youth and beautie lost,
The Spring-time bounteous	Though Art, and care, and cost,
Couers againe from shame and cold:	Doe promise Natures helpe in vaine.

And of which,

CATULLVS, EPIGRAM. 53.	Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux,
Soles occidere & redire possunt:	Nox est perpetua una dormienda.
The Sunne may set and rise:	Sleepe after our short light
But we contrariwise	One euerslasting night.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preferred, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

THele be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankinde, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things; with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life; a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne guide, his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter, that he might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change, and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should surely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Aethienensis (saith Strandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphosis among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was said, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutallitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltie, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiters; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruel men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensualitytie; by Wolves, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false prophets, Which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolves: by the images of stones and stockes, foolish and ignorant men; by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. JOHN BAPTIST, Of the generation of Vipers, &c.

¶ VII.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cur voluisse est fecisse. With whom, so will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God forst, that he left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, (but as afore-said) gave vnto man a power generative, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made eury Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to reach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.

That the seate of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and thus it is no marvell that men should erre.

CONCERNING the first Habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seate and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue beene in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographie, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heauens) the way how to find our iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousnesse thereof bee not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, wherein all things so obseruant Sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleueed in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnus error (magorum virorum auctoritate persuasi) transmissus; Wee passe ouer many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my selfe dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse.

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gave the knowledge of all things to any one. S. 2. Cor. 12. 2. Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi inuenitur? (saith Ioh 1) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhaire in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

¶ II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riuer, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riuer were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Francisus Georgius recieued (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose fruitles imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke, fol. 338. the last Edition. S. Ambrosius also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the mind, et in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue, in mente, or in our soule: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestially and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus is of opinion, that a Paradise had beene, but that there was not now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but without all the places now not so much as existing. To which Lusher seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two severall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, et omnigenis (ut vult erat) fructibus constare, sedem et hortum istam Adæ, et posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruite and multiplie, and fill the earth, and subdue it and rule ouer eury creature, doe cleerely shew, that the vniuersall earth (set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seate of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts 17. Apoſtolus ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum adeo factum docet, ut habitarent super vniuersam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answer in order. Gorpicius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Gorpicius findeth neere the Riuer of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Benauenture, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Ptolemy, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectatours, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible world, or rayled into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabo, and Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comerfor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Iudeus, that he wondered, Quo malo genio afflatus: By what will Angell he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuer which watered it, and by the points of the Compassie vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudea, or Canaan.

Nouisiomagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueneth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beautie adcribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

Gen. cap. 1.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And how soeuer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauit Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning, putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the Heuente Interpreters call it Paradisum Edeni, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, & for a Noume appellatiue; which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautiful Riuers, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe allwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposite to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof; so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuente; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Bispi. Chrysostome, Theodore, Gregorie, and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Av. ab. shm., and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Seuerinus, Damascentus &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damascentus owne words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place, maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hec incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo constium in regione terre Orientali, quæ dicitur Eden: Eden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden: For Moses (saith (saith he) dath shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. Peter. Ver. 16. CHAM endeououreth to qualifie this translation: for this particel (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise all mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduiseeth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Edens; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Petrus himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Eden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Eden, Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to find Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acessus: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damascentus;) affirming, that we westwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned them selues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies towards the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on Earth: so by Christs death and passion wee may be made partakers of the Paradise celestially, & the Kingdom of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other mystrie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden; in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ouid:
Eurus ad Auroram, Nabataeq; regna recessit; The East wind with Aurora hath abiding Perfidusq; & radijs inga subditi matutinis. Among th Arabians, and the Persian Hils, Whom Phabus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comerfor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est (saith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the same significations; From the beginning & Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 1. Chap. & 9. Ver. in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow eury Tree pleasant to the sight, & good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, & then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it & keepe

keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestiall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer; expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which hee calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

Ezech. 27. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabulosa est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fontaine, and then no Riuer, if no Riuer, then no such fountaine heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves, Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon Daniel: Canticant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbrae & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conatur euertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoria Legibus se debere subnere, Let the desire of them be silent, who following shadows and Images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth itselfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eat of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beafts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beafts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beafts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: *All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to be terrestiall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulities of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeming Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrha stood, (Sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnatural sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise itselfe exceeded in beautie and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soyle of farre exceeding excellencie.*

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alicious Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayes of the Elizian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. 1.

Per erat aeternum, placidum, sepius auris Mullebant Zephyrus natus sine semine flores.

The ioyfull spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their

Secta-

Señators, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conuersions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Harila and Cush, & that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) *Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiae: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approueth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: *Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nomen, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praeditum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

Why it should be needfull to inuite diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to waide through the Sea, and thence to haue come into Iudea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Riuers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approued witnessers of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or giue place to the iudgement of some Writers vpon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reuerence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe & separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, & rise vp againe in this our habitable world, & in those places where they are now found? Which left any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestors own words. Est autem locus amantissimus, longo terre & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adieuat, ut vsq; ad lunare globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasur place, seuered frō our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, cleaued so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quod, respondit volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atq; hac nostra extet terra, eos, fieri et illine per precipitum delabantur fluvij tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eorum impetus impulsus pressus, sub Oceano vasto rapiuntur, unde rursus profiliant ebulliant; in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Rivers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and preit, they are carried under the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephraim, which is this. Ephraim dicit Paradisum ambire terram atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totu terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbi Lunæ cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Naue of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, & out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displicant to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the stremes & branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe; & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delighfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beautie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeares after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remaine the same Rivers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a Riuer to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those riuers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the riuers run as they doe, North & South) & therefore these riuers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that that either these Riuers were turned out of their courses, or new Riuers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is no high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is eyther by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the wind to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudd of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnwholsome mists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euermore disfigure the violence of outrageous windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moved with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes, which Pillars were set vp about 1426. yeares before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the erection of them; and Ioseph himselfe, to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleue all that he wrote, yet that, which he auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Berosus (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) saith, were to be seene in his dayes, who liued in the Reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile: and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Cephais was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of Mountaines, but that there were Mountaines from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood ouersflowed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damascenus (speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Mymadam excelsus mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confuentes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, And vpon Mymada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntuly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood: on which the Thalmodists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authoritie, either Diuine or Humane.

Lastly,

Gen. 2. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Floud did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreafed, by this that when Noa sent out the Dove the second time, he returned with an Olive-leaf in her mouth, which he had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discouered) he found not: for otherwise he might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest prooffe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: folium Olive, rapum or decerpium, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrarie) that the Floud made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradis might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation; and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

p. VII.

That Paradis was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountaine of those foure Riues.

Gen. 1. 8.
Abu 17. 26.

His conceit of Aug. Chysamenis being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noëmagus, Vadianus, Goropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradis was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over euerie Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of blood originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in proceffe of time ouer all the face of the Earth; yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which hee liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had bene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God bene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradis after Adams expulsion, if the vniuersall had bene Paradis? for then must Adam haue bene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradis, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradis into Paradis, except we should belecue with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie; he thinks all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. Now Macvius vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Riues, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

Gen. 2. 8.
3. 24.

And it is true, that those foure Riues, being so vnderstood, there could be no coniecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Pison was fallily taken for Ganges, and Gibon fallily for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Hanilah in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seuemie write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noëmagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet by their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephrem, Cyrius, and Athanasius: That Paradis was seated farre beyond the Ocean y^o Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many yeares after the Floud, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contayned a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needes no argument to disproue it.

Of their opinion, which make Paradis as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

Hardly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradis to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephus conceiued, that Paradis was farre in the East, but mounted about the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda vpon Scrabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Ruperius, in his Geographie of Paradis, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neereft heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neyther of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heaven it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerful God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Ensebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradis, and not this of Eden. Solimus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delighfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Aiho (called Acrothous) which being about all Clouds of Raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeares) are called Macrobiei (that is) Long-lined. A further Argument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserued from the violence of the floud: approued by Isidore; and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed Soules were preferred till the last iudgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Diuines reprobued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sic ut certum est, Enoch & Eliam nunc viuere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that Enoch and Elias doe now liue: so where they now liue, in Paradis or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephus giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradis should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Riues (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrult themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the furre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames haue bene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleaged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had bene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue bene too ioynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes a grosse account about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradis, being raised to this height, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those falls of waters, are deate from their infancy, like those which dwell neere the Catadupa, or ouer-falls of Nilus: But this I hold as fained. For I haue seene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them, are not deafe at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Petrus, Sed ego hac apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quae nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I doe not remember (saith he) that I euer read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

1. Cor. 15: 56-57

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his will-dome. Their taking vp might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For al- though flesh and bloud, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was easie to him that is Almightie. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth, sauing eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

1. Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleeued that Paradise was raised about the middle Region of the Aire, and twentie cubits about all Mountaines, that the flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleeued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it:) this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we afeble giue credit to Masius, Damasceus, & the Thalmodists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that faued themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith;

Gen. 7. 19.

Exod. 14. 21.

That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise faued by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleeued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatiuely, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding wittie, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, then to resolue, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both Springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the althes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence walsh off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolued vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeding of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climats.

THose which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Aequinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not be vnder the Line, because Eden is furre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas

it appeared, that euery Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropicke, and so toward the Aequinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat; It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countreies which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better; and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantasticall opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerer to the line it selfe. For 10 heroe experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeede it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farre off, are found by triall and the witness of mens trauales, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isa) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Aequinoctiall line, or neerer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Eastenly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of

20 the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many founts of delicate fruits, euery bea-
30 ring, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclodeth and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the root, fearing the iniury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered Husband Vernumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countreies called Terra vitiosa, Vicious Countreies: for Nature being liberall to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of this opinion were not decieued in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliketh this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoole-40 men were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calestria, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Es a. 37. and Ezech. 27.

THese opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor vnder Terrida Zona; it followeth that now we discouer and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names so with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Affrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extingnish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath fought (what he could) to extingnish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiected and intrahled.

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Countrey of Eden, we are to take for guides these two confiderations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Countrey to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petrea; but in this region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petrea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riueri only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countreies, in these words, Spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsaken: Have the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telsassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were 2. Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembereth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapoliitan: the second part is that Valley so called Auenis, otherwise Connallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Affyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desart; & where Ptolemie placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Demus Edeni, or Calefryria, otherwise Fallis cana, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Libanus and Amalibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greece is Causin Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and fo ioyne vnto it, as it could not be vnknowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleued this Calefryria to be the same which Moses described. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Berauldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise; though, to giue Berauldus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, sauing, That hee sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the foure riueri (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Desarts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countreies are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyne with it. For (saith ESAIAM) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telsassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneith Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer bene the custome, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Laiassa. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countreie yielded: and hauing counted the seuerall People and Countreies, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broyded workes, fine linnen, corral, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faieres, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countreies yeelded; and and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plentie of gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneith with Eden, inhabited so furre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the Citie of Taphusac, where Ptolemie appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Almercatoribus ex Syria Seleucia & Babylonis cunctibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which traueile fro Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Fr in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which filleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, & Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charr, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluuior, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Countrey between riueri: for Me in Greece, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos fluuius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Fr (as aforesaid). For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of Land from the borders of Calefryria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabite Batanea, and the North part of the Desarts, stretching theselues toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena, which lieth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desart. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witness Appian); and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Citie, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Telbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite vnto it, where these riueri of Tigris and Euphrates are readie to ioyne. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seat thereof, that so many other Citie did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Telbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betwene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Citie by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other Citie ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Ind.

Indes speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuerterentur, perueniunt ad Charan, quæst in medio itinere contra Ninim, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charan, (which is the mid-way against Ninia) the eleventh day.

AE. 7. 1. This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charan (speaking to the high Priest:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charan. But the seat of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Craſſus the Roman, who for his insatiable greediness was called Gorgæ auaritia; The gulfe of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

GEN. 10. 10. But this Citie Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Mosès himselfe, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erach, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Mosès sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar or neere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth itselfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. 20 And that Shinar was Babylonia, is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Uſ. 2. Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Mosès to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Eſay in the threats of Senacherib against Hierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. But before I conclude where Eden itselfe lieth, it is necessarie to describe, those other Countreies, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the ſonnes of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the ſonnes of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the ſonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Perſian gulfe (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezechiel) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faïres with the chiefe of all ſpices, and all precious ſtones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Perſian gulfe. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue bene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plentie of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromaticques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Perſia ora inſula eſt, in qua multi & pretioſi uniones gignantur: in alijs uerò, clari & perlucidilapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Perſian gulfe, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, verie cleare and ſhining ſtones. Now, the difference betwene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech), and Sheba with (Sehin):

but whatsoeuer the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countreies and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Perſian Sea and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72. Plaſme: expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, paſt vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine ſtream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandize toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charan, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northweſt: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-eaſt. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldaean Paraphraſt, which Countrey by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R:) which change the Hebrewes also often vse.

Thus much of those Countreies which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyris. Now to make these things the more plaine, wee must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly diſſoynd.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabſache, the while the Armie of Aſſyria lay before Hierusalem, that the Cities of Golan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had resisted the Aſſyrians, though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Golan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Hierusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Aſſyrians. After which ouerthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his owne ſonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon succeeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subuerſion. So as, the ſuſpition of warre encreaſing betwene Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the Aſſyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) saith Iunius, ſignifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Aſſyrians. This place Hierosolymitanus takes for Reſem, others for Selencia: but this Telaſſar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Perſia) calleth Tibilutha in ſtead of Telaſſar, who describeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24. Booke: it is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a ſteepe and vnaſſailable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Julian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Aſſyrians, being also a paſſage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridata, hauing Reſeph (which he calleth Reſeptha) on the left hand, and Canneh; which he calleth Thelbe-canne on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the Citie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all these seated together, as Eſay and Ezechiel haue ſorted them. But the vnderſtanding of these places is the more difficult, because Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Aſtaria) and Mesopotamia, were ſo often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Aſſyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranſſerunt (saith NIECE.) Aſſyria and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charan or Haras in Mesopotamia: also by Canneh and Reseph, according to the opinion of Parabius, who in these words translateth this place: Plantauit autem Iehouah deum hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is: (saith he in his Annotations.) Iusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiae & Mesopotamiae, Hecommandat Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

p. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it comes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the proofe of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminencie.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the River, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Hafan-Cepha, otherwile Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosfal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not about twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosfal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quae nunc Mosel dicitur, magna sunt, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta nere unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosfal (or Mozal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbor-hood of Ninive; and that it is the famous Selencia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mozal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Ninive; Of all the Cities & Townes which are about the Citie of Mozal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Selencia) for Selencia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat nere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosfal, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Ninene, Philostratus, and Simen Sethi, Mosla, and Iohn Lean Mosal, others Mosel, (though it bee not the same with Mosfal) is set but a little higher vpon the same River of Tigris, nere Mosal: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosfal, makes it to be below Hafan-chepha, which is vpon the same River of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnp probable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the floud called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betwene Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethiopic maketh mention, (not that latter Ethiopic, Disciple of Callenicus, otherwile by Plutarch and Athenicus called Isir, who liued in Aegypt in the Reigne of Phyladelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethiopic, Adonis for Edenis, yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Ethiopic. For Ethiopic makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions, (saith Ethiopic) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them trauesse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitie thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetual Spring.

Also STEPHANVS de urbibus mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Calefria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seutentie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigris omnes exponunt: & almen vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Varable.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queene Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the River of Tigris, hauing no sufficient authoritie to chooſe themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without foure or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselves had made: hauing three hundred yeare before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a courteous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to inflitue Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had bene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Verum nos non acceptauimus nec proclamauimus ipsum, sed subito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Ninive, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula quae est in medio Tigri, fluminis Eden, ex Tauri Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninive, & out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbella, and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vsd these words: Neg. super sunt apud nos Ateropolite, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adurbeigan, en vestigio convenimus in Insulam, que est in Tigrim flumen, Edem, scilicet, compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Ateropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasius, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selues, &c.

Now this Island of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceiued, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: Mox auditis illius morte, concurrisse alicubi tumultuario in istam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosul posita, decem ferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, maris undiq. cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelue miles above Mosul, containing very neere ten miles in compass, and enerie where incircled with a wall, inhabited by a few other men then Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hosan-cappa, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impositam; Aboue the aforesaid Island of Tigris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his general Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gese est au milieu de la riuere du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie, Geserta ou Gese est in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden lieth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in T belassar were garriſond to resist the Assyrians, whose displacement Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those fowre, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuer: to rise from one ſtreame.

BVt it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden: and not Riuer, in the plurall, which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, quinque diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvij procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tigris in differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it converts it thus: Et fluvius egrediebatur de delicijs, And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, *Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was divided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuer, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seed, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi In the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees). And of this opinion is David Kimhi, and Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for numquid illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be giuen to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof: For this Riuer, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, & ere long yedderth foure notable passages into severall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueyance into the Countreies named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countreies (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or waltheth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar malcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Histonians is Nahar fares or Narragas, for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a Riuer deriued), also Acraçanus, quasi Ranofus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Selencia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excelleniam, being the bodie of the Riuer Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer, or Riuer, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuer: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we find, that Tigris is the Riuer of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe Citie was Ninive, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Citie of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuer be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aquæ (saith VLTIANVS) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascatur, fons, si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, priminitia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fontaine, then is the Fontaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new banks, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuer.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

T may also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitie and beaurie, as Eden the seate of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninus, and so from Mesal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hec regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and headeth afterward: Cereus autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeldeth two hundred fold: The leaues of Wheate and Barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sefame, they 20 are euen in length like vnto Trees, which althoug I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig Trees. Thus saith Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Brad, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Anonius the Eremite findeth a fifth commoditie, not inferior to any of those foure, which 30 is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine Flaxe, of which people make their Garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Anonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he rectified a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palma sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: *Eunthibus à parte lœua Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilibus, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam vberè & pingui solo, ut à passu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satiati perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champaine Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Cattell from pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. But in anno segetes Babylonij secant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countreyes generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northerne parts: so we may judge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latine: *Tota enim hæc regio fragibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis itemq. semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & 40 Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe, so great is the fertilitie of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare Seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds* (saith* (saith Plinie) who addeeth this singulartie to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeldeth them a Haruest of Corne without any further labour: his words are these: Pobertatis tante sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitibilis fiat seges. Plin. Nat. hist. lib. 18. cap. 47.

Of the Riuer Pison, and the Land of Hauilah.

After the discoverie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gebon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuers should trouble for many wife men it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuers of Eden, which water Paradis, which Riuer or Riuers Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gebon, &c. Could there bee a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Aegypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuers as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these Riuers were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witnesseth. 20 There is no error, which hath not some flipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (training reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the Riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris 30 tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush; and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Israhel, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradis the other Gen. 10. 7. where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Israhel were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Israhel, that Iland of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous Riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuers, named by Moses, must of necessitie be 40 of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous Riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another Riuer, whom in their respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the Riuer Indus on this side India, for beaurie, for neerenesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus cometh betwene it and Tigris? and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie betwene those two proud Riuers of Indus and Ganges now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, who so euer readeth the storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspis (as afore said) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suafius, Acsefnes, Adri (otherwise Hirois, Hispalis, and Zaradas, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one freame, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia vilerth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Hauilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must some where be ioyned with the rest in one bodie, or at least be found to proceede out of the same Countrey of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vntermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucasus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Gorgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gordicane Mountaines, so as Ganges, who onely trauaileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, neuer saw the land of Eden, or ioyned themselves in one channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. 15.

Therefore the River Pifon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pifis-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which Kiur watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, so called of Hauilah the Sonne of Ishtan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bellium is a Tree, of the bignesse of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeeldeth a certaine gum sweeter to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bellium. Serodius affirmeth, that Bela in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Engubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrey of Susiana or Hauilah stretcheth it selfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Sirabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Struch.
Etoph. de Par.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (sayth Hepkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellefont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Hauilah or Susiana, doth to this day retaineth some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these Riueres, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandas, as, by Positellus, by Cassaldus, of Baldach: by Barins, of Bagdad; and of Bonghedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yet all those that haue lately seene it, call it Bagdat. To this Riuer of Pifon, Ptolomie indeede with many others giue the name of Basilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mabar-jares and Marsus, and Basar-jares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Sirabo and Plinie called Pixires: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profusion, or comming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Parath, (sayth Ar. Mentanus): Pagnion, Perath: Iosephus, Phorab; Eusebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Gistilanus, and Coluinianus terme it Cohar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affryans know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglitio, and Diglat, Seilax, and Sol-lax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Riueres: for Euphrates and Tigris (sayth he) freame into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason, why these two riueres ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pifis-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldea not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence (were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsely interpreted Ethiopia) fastened to it on the other side, wee shall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of Riueres, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the Sonne of Ham first fate downe with his sonnes Shebab, Hauilah, Sabtah, Baamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pifon compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe: For as the sonnes of Ishtan, Ophir and Hauilah, seated themselves as neere together as they could in India, so did the sonnes of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Deserts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalechites possesse all the interiacent Countreies: for Saul smote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the East India, for Saul was no such traualer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrey Saul wasted: for Amalec & the Amalechites possesse that necke of Countrey, betwene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East; and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumians, from the East part, or backe side of the Holie Land, to the bankes of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petraea and Deserta.

§. XIII.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Ethiopia for Cush, 2. C. HIRON. 11. 16.

Now, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pifon so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Septuagint translated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greekes whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopiens are, as much, as blacks or burnt faces, whose proper Countrey is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there bee many other Regions of Ethiopiens, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopiens are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth forsake in this manner: There are (sayth he) two Ethiopia's, the East, and the West; and this diuision he findeth in Sirabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Cush and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the East Ethiopia.

c. 7. §. 10.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitanis Ismael ab Hauilah vsq; Sur, quare respicit Gen. 25. 18. Egyptum

Ægyptum introeuntibus Affyrios; ISMAEL dwelt from Haulah unto Sur, that is, towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Affyria; The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cabb, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Haulah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (where of there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Ægypt and Affyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zearab the Chusite, which others call Thuramiba, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had been a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betwene Palestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, hee in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zearab round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the wordes of the Scripture disproving it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt between Cadsh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had beene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure ABIMELECH and the Philistims were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse false his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his first Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Ægypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Prester Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the River Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perossi, Duraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Prester Iohn, and the Troglodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cabb and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Ægypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, vvhich he hath of Moses when hee serued Pharaon, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Ægypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HIEREMIZ: And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Ægypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, vt bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, que significat nigrum & turbidum; Truely (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethra, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopiissim, as (with Iosephus) the Genens conuers it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia

gain, in the third of Exodus; When MOSES kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indee, these four names are eury where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusely together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharaos Steward. The Genenians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense, and their Spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the first of Iudges, That when Israel had sowne, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden care-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden care-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and euer in action of warre. Manus eius contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharaon (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierom reads it: the Genens translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe & ioine with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirtie, or three & thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Ægypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharaon, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue bene translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Stenchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ierneth to Arabia.

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the River (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preferred by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaon) a River of Ægypt, where in he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, Israelites, that Nilus had bene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Egypt, & once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being oftengouerned by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Galestians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Ierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Tebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the tony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Mas. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges; nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else-where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourish'd, being then their neere Neighbours, & neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Sustana;) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia felix. Nimrod seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Tames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Tames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of some Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discovered, shall wee in like sort resolute that France, Spain, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Successors within a few yeeres after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Cush in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retayned their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in halfe crepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Bulb and Bryar, Reede and Tree to ioyne themselves (as it were) into one mayne body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family feared themselves as neare together as possible they could, and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, fate downe in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayed; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleauid and enriched; so did Hauilah place himselfe vpon Piso: Tigris: Raamah and his sonne Sheba farther downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Nimue, Charran, Reseph, Cannab, &c. in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other; as is already often remembered.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of somethings spoken of before.

BE now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Vines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this said soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. For wherein focusse the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatsoeuer his life begetteth at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniencies, and then there will bee found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge, Plants onely proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Judas, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioync in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pison was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioyned, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuer of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris & Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauielleth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographickall description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time as this description of mine be reprocured by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

Or eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium uitae temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten upon them, haue in this also deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum uitae, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserue both the growing, sensitiue, and ratiouall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortall, but that it must once perill and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures, Man

Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngrievd life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceived. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleeft, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortal. But such is the infinite Wisdome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceived, that the same was not materiall, but a mere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will gree to him that ouercommeth, to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines may luffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestially. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth every Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, stole the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous; and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to bee the meate and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus's opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could deuise, he luffice at, whereto Goropius much maruaileth. But as hee had an inuentive braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleeued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howsoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet hee surpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention bee at that price at which hee setteth it. For Moses Barcephas hath tied on this coniecture about sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Barcephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Mabrogensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith hee would induce other men to that beleeft. For Moses Barcephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Euphrates, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus; where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porsus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) some what bigger, and that it is a tree, sempiterna, Almaies planting it selfe; that is preadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, & leaues no lesse then a shield.

Aristobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these Trees. Oueserius rayleth this number to four hundred. This tree (saith Plinius theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinius and Oueserius confirme: to the trunk exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinius and Oueserius confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may bee, that all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because hee found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the Riuer Acclines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, 10 some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twig in the trunk or stemme: for from the vmoest end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vmoest boughes of these yong Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one yeare and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees 20 considered with all his yong ones, may (indeed) throwd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidad. The cordes which fall downe ouer the banks into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene fise hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauiell'd a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Gorapinus Becanus. This Tree (saith 30 hee) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill is describ'd to bee.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report; and Becanus beleueeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinarie magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in media ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-ce-40 phas, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinius auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum peltis effigiem Amazonia habet; The broadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

The Amazon with Crescent-formed shield:
Penthesilea leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credite to this his borrowed discourse, vying this confident (or rather cholerike) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hac à nobis de sicu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Moyses narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, que cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things; which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of Moyses, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibitum, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum parum ac simplicis Obedientie bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience. Augustinus Cuius. Dei, l. 1. c. 10.

¶ III.

OF BECANUS his not vnwisly allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

IN this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did man grow straight and vpriht towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vnbragiousnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this 30 fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choller and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world insensible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and 40 boughes of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather sifting and becoming the vnworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing statelynesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintayne which, wee vfe so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Barcephas an ancient Syrian Doctour (translated by Ma- 25 lies) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientie boni & mali (ideft) experientie boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanhip of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortallitie from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) bee ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods Commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sickness is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the prooffe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. Herthen saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid:) so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones, called the heape of witness, betwene Jacob and Laban, north that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the Covenent: So Jacob called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar; the Well in the Desert, Vientis, & videmus.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obtayne by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing persuasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very roote, which he moyntined with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

But what meanes did the Deuill find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a Comforter and Companion, but not for a Counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saith God himselfe.) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and unworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the moue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remayned in all the posteritie of her sex. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her persuasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest shee should pine and be ouercome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of David, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable that other men in succeeding ages haue bene allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wives, or other beloued Darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeite passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betwene the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

S. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

10 THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuius of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first Murtherer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnatural Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater then he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (where with the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with crueltie: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with crueltie thorough them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this crueltie meant to haue bene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murther of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed vtrunque simul; God (saith Saint Augustine) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: *Ist be in Heauen (saith David) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also.* But what is meant thereby? Exijt a facie Dei (saith Chrysostome) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

10 His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Septuagint conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wandering in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: *And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me.* Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherin Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Vandering and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vniuilly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines, Pastores vagi; as the Northerne Tartarians, the Cetulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Brittains, and the Northerne Frisch: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it selfe, till such time as Italy (who gaue them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, vsed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemie, Calena, which also might be deniued of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus hee cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text, Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the World, which hee indolced either for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauaileth in feare 20 of reuengement: for whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the Citie Enoch, were the first societie and ciuill assembly of all other, it is likely that the same of these people (either for crudelie, strength, or other actions) liued in the memorie of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of: natures, some veruiously, some impiously disposed, and euery active minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crudelie and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments 30 might remayne (as the Pillars or the foundation of Ioppe did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our selues, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & Nations there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In * Plinie, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, wee finde those Henochi described, though diuersly written, as in Plinie, sometimes Heniochi, in Mela 40 Eniochi, in Flaccus Heniochi, in Lucan Enochy, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the Eastside of Eden, or (according to Moses wordes) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the cleuenth hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Enoch the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochy of Colchis, & other parts adioyning were not the first of that name, after the Sonnes of Noah began to till the World againe: because, had this Enoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For hee calleth these of Colchis (now Atengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolemie Zani; beyond which 50 an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these he againe discouereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountaines of Panipus, betwene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochy are due East from the Region of Egypt, and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although wee cannot bee assured, that these Henochy tooke name from the memorie of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came 10 into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, then that of Ammius the Frier, who sets Enoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these severall Nations of the Henochy, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Onely the Gracians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telebins, who attended them in the enterprise of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greekes ranged the Coasts of Asia the 20 lesse in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speake in his owne time: yet no man doubreth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse vse of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains Generation.

BVt of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Enoch in prophane Storie, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some 30 few Objections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (hauing no other alliance then his Sonne Enoch) to performe such a Worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that hee containeth the whole Storie of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1636. yeares, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first Generations of men liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. 40 yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and meanes to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacitie answering to what other of the World soeuer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that hee built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sonnes peopled all the World; but in both, the proccesse of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betwene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Eni autem post dies multos a fine diuini (that is) in proccesse of time, it 50 came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, hee built the Citie of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that hee built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that hee employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our kinses to say, The King inuaded; when he caused an inuasion to be made: and hee built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also passeth

C. 5. v. 5.

passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses, writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne Enoch. And to Enoch was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAEL, and METHVSAEL LAMECH.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807 yeares, and begat Sonnes & Daughters: so as all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeares, and he dyed: as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viuentium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2 Cain.	7 Lamech, who by	2 Seth	7 Enoch.
3 Enoch.	Ada had	3 Enosh.	8 Mathusalem.
4 Irad.	8 Tubal and Tubal, &	4 Cainan:	9 Lamech, and
5 Mahiuel.	by Silla Tubalcain,	5 Mahaleel.	10. Noah.
6 Mathusael.	and Noëma.	6 Larad.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threecore and seuentene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wiues Ada and Silla: and to these three Sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musicke, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into Heards and Droues: Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom beganne these three manner degrees of Shepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomie: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

II. IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath beene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and five yeares, whereas Lared begat not any of his vntill hee was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee coniectured, that either Lared, Mathusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before hee was threecore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Floud precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldest of Lared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Iaphet, though these three were only named, and suruiuing, and which by God were referred to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Floud; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Cenan at threecore and ten yeares who was the first Sonne of Cenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeares of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

Gen. 1. 20. 21. 22.

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, & so to Abraham, and the children of the Promise after him, so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogie of Christ, nor by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Elates, worldly and transitorie only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esaue the elder, neither is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simcon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth Brother; and so from Dauid a younger sonne of Iessai; and lastly, wee find, that the Kingdome selfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon.

III. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

The third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betweene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well-neere scene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing, that soone after the Floud, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue hereon resolved that those yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Month or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and five, if those yeares be taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares, and one Moneth when hee begat Enosh: & if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when he begat Cenan, then could Enosh at that time haue beene but fixe yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and so it may bee gathered of the rest excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of Generation at six, seven or eight yeares, agreeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the Word, had length of dayes and abilitie of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extremitie, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourecore and ten and odde yeares; which were not only lesse by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the Floud, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourecore, & some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seuentene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonablen, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beger Children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first and purest feed there must of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfulllest Plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull qualitie, as since that time the Curse of God for the crudelie of mans heart brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Floud infused such an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits vnder the Earth recieued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another of weaknesse, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformitie: so Time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themselves being of a most pure and clesned matter, shall waxe old as a Garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God recieue operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the olde age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicitie of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of Children, first fedde and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an ynnaturall curiositie hauing taught all Women (but the Begger) to find out Nurles, which necessitie only ought to commend vnto them: The hasty Marriages in tender yeares, wherein Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe Seeds (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, and wax old euen in their Infancie. But about all things the exceeding luxuriousnesse of this gluttonous Age, wherein wee presse Nature with ouer-weightie burdens, and finding her strength defectiue, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath thetse elegant Verses:

*O prodigarum

Et questorum terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lauta gloria mensæ,*

*Discite quàm paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.

Vita redit: satis est populis flumina, Ceresq;.*

O wastfull Riot, neuer well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious Of Cates by Land and Sea furre fetcht and sent:

But with the Brooke the peoples thirst is serued:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not sterued.

The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to strength fiftie yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares, and Berosus to a hundred and seuentene yeares. These opinions Plinie repeareth and reprovet, producing many Examples to the contrarie. In the last taxation, number and reuiue of the 30 eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (saith Plinie) foure and fiftie persons of an hundred yeares of age: seuen & fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fise and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fise & thirtie, or hundred and seuen and thirtie yeares old: & last of all three men of an hundred and fortie: and this Search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Sonne.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Essians gaue them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little lesse: Also Masanissa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued 40 three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus.) Hellenicus affirmeth of the Epelians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe, as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Elius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Müller, who liued in the yeare 1589. and many yeares since, who was married in Edward the 40 Fourth time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Manster can witness. Srozzius Cicogni, out of Torquemada Massens, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not only far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but bene repayed from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Philisian liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnauaries in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Fourth scruple hath bene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had bene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the Vnruerfall Flood.

But if we consider the curiositie and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoeuer was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wife men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine litteris, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarus, (as Mirandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretorum & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law, which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he deliuered by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vn- 30 derstanding and wisdome began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as serued in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation; the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a rectiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Bymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the 40 holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preferred and left to their successors: which their wife men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seib, and Seib his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fise hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the verie infancie of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch, of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remayned euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof, which pillars by others are ascribed to Seib. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude tellifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie 10 of Cabala est scientia theologiae non reuelata, P. M. 82. Mirand. 110. 66.

Origen Homil. 1. in Num.

of the first Age, seeing he might receiue it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to proue them vnwritten traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he receiued) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoeuer was remembered out of them, the same was deliuered by Tradition from the times. But I rather thinke with Pererine, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and 10 many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the bodie of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla diuina Enoch illum septimum ab Adam negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam did write diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonically Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Iude, no man can denie; how they were deliuered to posteritie I know not, whether by the times Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is verie probable that Noah had seene and might preferue this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters 30 and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Metushalem, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other prooffe then self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renoune before the Flood.

Now let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; 40 and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel, yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicquely to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Iared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpriight man, 50 and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah: Noah was a iust and vpriight man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seuentie conuert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (uiui cum Deus: scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betweene the pietie of Enoch, and the rest of the Pa- 60 triarchs, triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Paetriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he dyed; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressely added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which S. Paul promisseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, 1. cor. 15. 51. but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Metushalem and Lamech, remembering (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hand; as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more 10 amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, beeing the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Familie) preferred, because hee was an vpriight man in his time, and feared God. Gen. 5. 29. Gen. 11. 9.

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remaying: whose stories if they had bin preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues 20 of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisdom and vnderstandings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoeuer can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when wee no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus paucis; (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses: These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renoune. Gen. 6. 4.

But these men of renoune (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and crueltie of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seth, and the waies wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, onely euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse 30 was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersal, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their idolatrous wiues, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselves and the world only. Apor. 1.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lactanius and Eusebius, mis-led by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great aduantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and vey needlesse: the 40 question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fel with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine. Gen. 6. v. 4.

§. VII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

These Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Horapion Becanus an Antuerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and Rayned his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whosoever desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treasuries before named. It is true that Cyrollus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelesly, That 1

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembered; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine:

*Nomine caelestes illos dixere Gigantes,
-Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cæli.*

From the Earth, and from thy blood, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and nor to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress; then say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenterous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly harkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserue to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegorical construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found 30 of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewise, where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vseth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, asslitted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oke; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and foure cubits broad: for onely Og King of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in this land are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our fights like Grasshoppers, and so wee were in their fight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: inasmuch that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to return againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slauerie, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of fixe cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed five thousand thickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare-head weighed sixe hundred thickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Gerbeus, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had beene a Kid, and after fixe thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a law-bone of an Asse: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infiebled and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farre exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in generall, soone after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neq. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui paenitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa presentia. Sed si non vultur Scriptura salubris verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & alac intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vse to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: thus it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and mountrish those that vnderstand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

p. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations; by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deliuering it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and nor as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw healthfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull herbes and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the works and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely express.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were verie ancient : as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it rooke such effect, that thereby (the liberrall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the general flood 10 could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former payson. For as the children of Sem did inherite the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chal-deans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phenicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue funerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina 20 primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosque prius aras, & immagines, & templa Dijs sibi erexisse. The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes receyued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Euterpe.

§. III.

That in prolesse of time these lesser errors drew on greater : as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander foreuer more in vices vnkowne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition : 30 so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and thirke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reue-rence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Euening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner :

Nat. com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bonem colū, ego Deū maīto bovem.

Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas : ego

Obsoniorum credidi suauissimum.

Carnes suillas tu canes, at gaudeo

Hys maxime : canem colū, quem verbero

Edentem ubi deprehendo fortē obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.

I broyle the Egyptian Eccles, which you (as god) implore:

You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.

You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,

When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VERNAL.

Porrum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu :

O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis

Numina !

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite

Their Leekes or Onyons, which they scue with holy rite:

O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing

Haue store of gods in euerie Garden growing !

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were inuenced : and that the first IVPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TVBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient patterne they erected their building, were it not certayne, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoeuer was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remaying after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be sayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcanes, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many pro-phane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phenicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greek, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne : for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For, besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Ioue ædificatam : yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient IVPITER, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses :
And CAIN dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochij were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Hercæus, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phormus and Pau-lania) and that to Iupiter Hercæus there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increafe, they built many Cities; for which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes : he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de urbibus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Enoch, Philo Iudeus conceiue that Cain built fixe others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet, and Gebas: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuectors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apolo; and as there is a likelihood of name betwene Tubalcain and Vulcan : so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venus, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure, as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter; Eua, Rhea, and Noema or Naamah the first Venus : so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah : so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides : the prophecies, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus : so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuersion of their Heroes (the inuectors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Astræa; of which Ouid.

For although thereby the Ethnickes would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may bee considered without a person; yet as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch: the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a iust man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renoune) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vndertaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Corneilius Senerius thus describeth:

Tentaure (neas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiuis, Iouis transferre Gigantes Imperium, & victo leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moylture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had bene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eight and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with bloud.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and succellour Setho, of Seth; and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Sethesia. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elswhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

p. V.

Of the three chiefeſt IVPITERs; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals

The first was Iupiter. the sonne of Ether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for Ether is as much as shining or pure fire): the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witness: of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third of whom all the Gracian fables were deuised, was of Crete (now Candia) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iuuanis Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayned. Boccas in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiveth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planer; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but howsoeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deserued) as the worthyest; that euer were, acquired by their well desertings. Ioue omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERs, as Tzetzes in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim IOVES vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERs. But where this last and most remembred Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vnkle: because it was conditioned betweene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is fayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine;

*Haud sit pinguior,
Crudis sepulchrum quid sit ipse filijs.* | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne, By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betweene Titan and Saturne, Syllia also witnesseth in these; Conceptis verbis; TITAN inuare coegit SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutrias vllum, Quo possint regnare semis post fata Deopot.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne sweare No sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conueyed Iupiter (first called Lysanias) into Cræte, as hee did afterwards his two brothers, Nephtine and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Iland, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that hee was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once settled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away; and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphytrion, by whom hee had Pelagus, Sarpidon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountayne Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Saon:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Lada, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Euboeus) Britomartis: by Protegeia, he had Athlius the father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Aegypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Country tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. Hee-raiuled Aegina the daughter of Aeolus, and carryed her into the Iland Oceopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aacus: by Torthebia hee had Archebulus and Carbus: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanus by Heletra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Hiarhes. He had besides these (if they beleye not their chiefe God) Phileus and Pilumhus, inventors of Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his severall raiulments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into howes of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beafts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deferred nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo jani, reprocheth Cleodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Lucian). Cretenses non solum natum apud se 20 sepulchrum Iovis restant, fed etiam sepulchrum eius offendunt; The Cretians or Candians do not onely avow that Iupiter was borne and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, forin his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountayne Iasus. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'ſt alway.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greek Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Venerable parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Vranus (which significth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wives 45. sons; but by his principall wife Tiea, he had fountene sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Tiea, likewise it is said, that three for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was titled Heauen. But of all the children of Tiea, her daughter Baflea (which name soundeth as Queen in English, there is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by general consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queen after her fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sonne and Moon. The beautie and towardnesse of these children moued her brethren to enuy, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortal, that also the Sonne and Moon, should be called by their names, and that their death should be reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets. and vntill held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, which name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Vranus diuided the Kingdom, Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaynes, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wife Prince, deeply skillfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, said to haue supported Heauen.

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue beene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midt of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Iupiter, another of the sonnes of Proanus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wifes name, Idea; in which Ile hee dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue beene that great one, but vncke to the great Iupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neare to the Riuier Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused secretly, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuier Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certayne Nymphs. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, she fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely enterrained her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiter's children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seeme, being very gracious in those times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he vvan the loue of all the people by vvhom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigoros gouernment, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemy as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, vnder the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child, Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Country; but appointed vnto him as an Quer-ter, one Olympus, of vvhom Iupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whiles Bacchus traualled through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, Ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chafed them, tooke, and slew them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes leftaliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historio. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of quod existit; For MOSES saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: Genitorem vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maieſtie of Gods Nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so assuredly the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APULEIUS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam natura dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was euerywhere present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

Cælum terraq; vniue forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abiuncta amplexu matuo,
Emerſit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, ferae, quaq; aſſert mare,
Genusq; mortalium.

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when diſſoynd once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euerywhere expresse the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; 30 but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina: The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Devils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respiciens verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum aduertit, intendens cordia rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascendende viam, & solum aspicie mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quisquam cum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart; that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend, And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

IVPITER omnipotens, & primus, & vltimus idem;
IVPITER est caput & medium: IOVIS omnia munus.
IVPITER est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
IVPITER & mas est, & semina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validis vis IVPITER ignis.
Et pelagi radix, SOL, LVNA, est IVPITER ipse
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occuluit, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor reſerans bonus in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.

The first of all is GOD, and the same last is he.
GOD is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is GOD, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end.
For cloſe in holy brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Gracians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eusebium, Pencer, Plessis, Danew, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, scilicet pſidens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, ſeuerus, liber, ſemper commodus, tutus, glorioſus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, poſſeſſing himſelfe, profitable, beautiful, beſt, ſeuere, free, alwayes doing good, ſafe without ſtate, glorious and ſeſſe-charitie. EPICHRANVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was onely and euerywhere powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipſe ſolus; Hee is the only King of Kings: and with Proclus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator ſummus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progreſſus ſingulis diuerſos ſecundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the moſt high Creator, and beſt artiſer, who giueth to euery thing diuerſ proceedings according to their deſerts. This God (saith ANTIſTHERES) cannot be reſembled to any thing, and therefore not elſewhere knowne; Niſi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habet: Saue onely in that euerlaſting Countrey, whoſe image thou haſt none at all. Hereof alſo XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus ſimilis; There is one God among gods and men moſt powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiete facit, magnus poteſtis, quod omnibus pater: qualis autem forma ſit, nemini pater, niſi ipſi ſole, qui luce ſua omnia perluſtrat; God who ſhaketh all things, and ſetteth all things at reſt, is great and mightie, as is manifeſt to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifeſt to none, ſaue onely to himſelfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light. Finally, Plato ſaith: Totius rerum naturæ cauſa, & ratio, & origo Deus, ſummus animi genitor, æternus animantium ſoſticator, aſſiduus mundi ſui opifex, ſine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore vſlo comprehenſus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cauſe, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the moſt high Father of the ſoule, the eternall preſerver of liuing creatures, the continual framer of his world; a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore a few can conceiue him in thought, none can expreſſe what hee is. Therefore was it ſaid by S. Hierome, Si enim cunctis Philoſophorum reuolues libros, necſſe eſt vſ in eis reperias aliquam partem vſalorem dici, vſ apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud XENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas &c. If thou conſider all the bookes of the Philoſophers, thou canſt not but find in them ſome part of the Deſſels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal ſoules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wiſedome of all Ages, wee ſhall find that there neuer was man of ſolid vnderſtanding or excellent iudgement: neither any man whole minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whoſe eyes a fooliſh ſuperſtition hath not afterwarnd blinded; whoſe apprehenſions are ſober, and by a penſiue inſpectiō 30 on aduſed; but that he hath found by an vneſtable neceſſitie, one true God; and euerlaſting being, all for euer cauſing, and all for euer ſuſtaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly expreſſed, then that Egyptian Hermes, how ſo euer it ſayd afterwarnd in his poſteritie: all being at length by deuillith policie of the Egyptian Priests purpoſely obſcured; who inuented new gods, and thoſe innumerable, beſt ſorting (as the Deuill perſwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and ſtreſt to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were as length about the same time under IULIAN miraculously confounded.

BVe all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuelle starueth, water quencheeth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, 10 their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the Earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollos Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfeit Aegyptians, and coozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repay- 20 red, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it receiued the last and viter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubean Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vterly sackt; Thirdly, by Pyrros the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phoenes: Sixty, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vterly burnt and consumed 30 with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Temple in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Tewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others flaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Tewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Alypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudaea, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, 40 made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOW the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of 50 Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. Herels them that truit is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature; and lastly, that as all vertue (in generally) is without taste: so pleasure fatisheeth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obaying of power to oppress, and of riches to maintayne plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that 10 he

he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poutie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, 10 licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAHS Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAHS Flood.

IF this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem 10 migravit: He departed with his children, and trailed into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptors & religionis & Deorum, contemptors of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum 20 venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. vnic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Japhet, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Tisea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of 30 Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Cloudes, 40 which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his family excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not beene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum euoluta in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wrapt up in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vni- 50 uersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue beene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by IOSEPHVS: Est super Arminiam 10 dam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuicium in huius vertice habuisse, reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam Moyses Inducorum Legislator scribit: thus saith this Author. There is (saith he) above Mimada (or the Countrey of Minye) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remayned a long time after certayne pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which 10 MOSES the Law-giner of the Tewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the

*T*hal mudifis (saith Annins) that many Giants faued themfelues vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howfoeuer he haue bene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Anie aquarum cladem famolam, qua vniuersus perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Tites, and his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only faued.

2. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

BVt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perwade the world, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Boetia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus) Ogyges id appellatur Poeta, tanquam in peruetus dixeris; ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gaue the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembereth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Graciam profectus Thebas condidit, à boue inquilato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Aegypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who trauiailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Daefie slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a Beeffe is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 3242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betweene these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds about 500. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040 yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzernus saith, it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzernus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow. (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzernus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betwene these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Prifus, as some doe) it appeares by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witness, that the Cite of Ioppe in Iudea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remayned on certayne Altars of stone the Tide of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Poloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Poloponnesus) of which Ouid:

Si quaras Helicen, & Buran, Achaïdos vrbes, Inuenies sub aquis.

Bura

Si quaras Helicen, & Buran, Achaïdos vrbes, Inuenies sub aquis.

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are sought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Caeus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Ino thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliued on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Pythion to follow & affrighte her, wherefoeuer she travelled: till at length arriving at the Ile of Ortygia, she was there receiued; in which Ile was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and foggies, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espyed the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gene populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Cassius, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adrahus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the reuolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and foggies than those which covered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite half should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, descreyning onely that part whereon the light falleth, appaere to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue bene discovered in Venus, by his late obseruations. Whether some wairie disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Gaius hath seene through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was generally, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or fore-shewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and tooke them all away.

Of DEVCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which, S. Augusline out of Varro: Hic temporibus (ut VINERO scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CECROPS, successore CECROPS (ut autem nostris, EUSEBIUS & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est DEVCALIONIS: (that is) in these times (as Varro reporteth) CECROPS the successor of CECROPS: gouerning the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and IO Hierome say) CECROPS yet living; that Flood (called DEVCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPS Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiados TRIOPAS: MOSES led the people of God out of Aegypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and over the Argines TRIOPAS. So as leaving the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was cyther at the e-gression of the children of Israel out of Aegypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753.
yeeres, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. 20 or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codomanus; then giuing vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approued Historians is said to haue bene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaetons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argines; but Crotopus liued King of the Argines fixe yeeres after Israel departed Aegypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Functius, who will haue this Flood and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moses left Aegypt: for he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeere 2440. 30 and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all: for that of Thessalie (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) atleast 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 69. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM inundatio qua fuit tempore OGYGIS: There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the Flood of OGYGES. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 40 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrewes left Aegypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe, who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, then the rest) I reck on the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Iacobs birth, there were con-fumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Iacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the 50 World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was ouerwhel-med; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782.
yeeres. And hereto Annus his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betweene the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which add 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEVCALIONIS, secundo annu SPHAEI, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEVCALION, in the second yeere

yeere of SPHAEVS, are numbered 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristo in the first of his Meteoros. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely ouer Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same, or some other particular Flood then happening, oppressed Aegypt, sayth Eusebius.

And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faine it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Flood couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Itali: quia ab imbris diluuij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezentius in his second; which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutij, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Apennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; theuing who, and who onely then were preserued: which is sufficient. Report hath aduenced further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camefe, whom CATO in originibus, another of Annus his Authors, names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as SATURNVS arriuing on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos, Gellius, and Varro among the Latines haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

*Primus ab aethera venit SATURNVS Olympo, Arma Iovis fugiens, & regni exul adeptus,
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Moluit.*

SATVRNE descending from the Heauens high,
Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.
Rude people on the Mountayne tops he wonne
To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speake of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe fought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani, Then came the Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligij, sayth Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Etruskes (sayth Annus) not of those Gaules of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, even all 50 Etruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie and Diogenes haue assured vs: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah: For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossessed of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being.
So that Kingdome was first called Camesenes, then Latium, or Saturnia, then Ausonia then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possessed the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycam then gouerning Arcadia, who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelagii, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speaks at large: and after them the Lydi, vnder Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who calling thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelue Cities: to which (after they had possit and past ouer the Appenine Mountaines) they added diuers others, wherof *T. Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

E Aint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the Vniuersall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successufully planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not recieued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigena, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heare-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authentic approoued: vntill the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembereth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preserue himselfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

Cyillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annus his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Bela-chus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this Flood couered a great part of the neether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Promethens; and hereof came the fable of the Culture on Promethens his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: Flauiam propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatem, aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculeum cum consilio magnitudine, non virtute, vultum vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum conuertisse: Vnde & Graci quidam Poete rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCULEM tradidit AQUILAM PROMETHEI iecur depascemem occidisse; This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great indgement and vertue did againe compress and straighten this River, so farre extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certaine Grecke Poets (concerning this labour and worke of Hercules into a fable).

fable) denis'd, that HERCULES slew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEUS Liuer; meaning that he deliuered Promethens of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annus conceiueh out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuerunt: prima nouissime in inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith this same Xenophon): the first, which was vniuersall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Promethens, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths, in Theffalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proetus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and cleuenth Chapter, taking the Samotheaces for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellspont breaking in ouer the Land.

But there haue been many Floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 550. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruellous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Tri-themius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Flood in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Sirofius Sigog. in his Magia amissaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damalus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixt: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembereth a peccilous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Craconia, by v. which many people perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Langue-doc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the VWorld, and Iudgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountures of ground, and many other places come vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goshes inundated that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene fore-seene by the Starres.

NOW howsoeuer all these Floods, and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southlayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the speciall commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres, and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of Nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoeuer vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountaine of all power strength, and faculties supernaturall. Hieronymus Mechliniensis a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Alba Major obserueth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation, since called the ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watric Signe, and the House of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moyfture, according to the rules of Aftonomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genefis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength receiued from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Cataractæ Celi (Englified the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and warrie coniunction; the word (Cataractæ) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a conflagellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Cataractæ Celi, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these warrie Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleides, Hyades, and Orions, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum Cataractas Celi vocasse, nisi partes illas Celi, quæ generatiue sunt pluuiarum & inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, vt Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by those words (Cataractæ Celi, or Windores of Heauen) whilest he thereby vnderstandeth those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendered the Raine, and 30 Inundations of Waters, such as are the warrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnsearchable Wisdome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoever else best pleased his All-powerfullest.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: And what are Cataractæ Celi, GEN. 7. VERS. II.

Now if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which is granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fiftene Cubits aboue the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrained himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnclearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels 40 of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Sybia, or that (of all other the highest) in Teneris, and I do not find, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth aboue thirte miles vpright: It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason; that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirte miles in height, this thirte miles vpright: being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and fixtene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and aboue it; we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuersion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleading) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may adde Berelius and others, That such a coniunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractæ Celi, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needs no other answer then that obseruation of Ludovicus Vines, who affirmeth, That by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Picus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

- 10 To conclude, I find no other mystrie in the word Cataractæ Celi, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and pouring downe of Waters. For whosoever hath scene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowrs, (where clouds doe not brake into drops, but fall with a resistible violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith 106. 12. v. 15. 108) he which holdeth the Waters, and they drie up, or better in Latine, Et omnia secantur, 20 And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they deluge the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He bindeth the Waters in the Clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the generall Floud, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deepe, and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of his will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caues, 60. 3. 11. and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memorie of Noah among the Heathen.

- 30 NOA H commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Arke which he had built, with his owne Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, seven of the cleane, and of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietness: after others, and according to the prophetic of his Father Lamech, restation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Sauirne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire: fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others 40 thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisdome and foresight. He had also the Name of Ianus, (id est) vinusius, because Iain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Terentian findes him written in Libri Rimalibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue: which three enioyed an elder time then all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pistor giueth this testi- 50 monie: IANI ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quia nonnullis pectoribus nondum hebesca villa regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primo populus docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primo enim Aras & Pomeria & sacra docuit. In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded in selfe about the beards of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meate: he first set up Altars, instructed Gardens and solitary Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agree so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soueraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meate. Thirdly, he was the first that rayled an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God; a thanksgiving 60. 3. 20. for

And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Ianus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimony: IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum haberat villa regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Feri primis populis docuit IANVS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomeria & sacra docuit. In the time of IANVS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded in selfe about the beards of men. IANVS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meate: he first set up Altars, instructed Gardens and solitary Groues, wherein they used to pray, with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie then this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilst Noah flourished, there was not any King or Monarchie; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayed up Altar, and offered sacrifice to God; a thanksgiving for for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia praterita nouerit, & futura profpexerit, saith ARNOBIUS; Because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confused Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants, so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Onid in the person of Ianus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quàm longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intitled Calum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vernannus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisiens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber pater, and his Nurfes Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he liued in sasseine on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysus, quasi diarionem, mentem purgens, Bisc-braine, or Wit-finger, though Diodorus so conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à patri & loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nysa, a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. Hee had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurrophagus; because hee first yoked Oxen, and tyled the ground: according to that of Moses; And Noah became an Husbandman. Now howsoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Inuention stolne from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boucks, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danues) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoeuer themselves faue of his enterprises: and these Mountaines of Nysa ioyned with those of Parapanisus; and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuer and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Cite of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noah in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie, Danuis; diuiding Ilyria from Pannonia. This much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neyther doe I finde any approved Author that hath written thereof: onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiue, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountaines of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre amongst people, called Nysas, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers verbrught ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God and Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he added the conueniencie of Riuer, to transport the Timber which he vsed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only

Onely this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World, and to my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not vse any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, then the Hulke or Body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore, it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible Winde at all, which could drie the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottome, and not rayled in forme of a Ship, with a shapenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inuentor of Auguration.

Petrus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinkes it derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Distinction: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius Epiph. in Ancor. out of the Hebrew, Aron; but herein lyeth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet, that Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it safe vpon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, that it had a Couer and Roofe, with a Crest in the midst thereof; and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House: to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysome felle of many Beasts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, that the Chenean Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seuentic, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant.

Plinie affirmeth, that in Aegypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the worrnes eat not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Cite, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1183. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete saueur, lasting also better then any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are foid great store of these Cedars trees, as also in all the mountaines of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Petrus conceiue, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, and that the bottome had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compass, or the North starre. The Pitch which Noah vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sedome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea, or Alphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

THe Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred 10 Cubites, fiftie of bredth, and thirte deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AUGUSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Cinitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, que fit salua per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisq; eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (sayth he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, traualing in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saued by the Tree whereupon the Mediator betwene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for euen the very measure of the length, height, and bredth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the comming of Christ 20 was fore-told and performed.

De Ciuit. Dei, lib. 4. c. 6.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches: The fourth is the facred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fift, Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth fixe common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar 30 Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens figures hath made the difference: For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

S. AUGUSTINE considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that Vessell built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philopater. But S. AUGUSTINE (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all 40 sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reuered. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept liuing (saith S. AUGUSTINE) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conseruare in Arca que possent in aquis viuere, non solum morsia sicut Pisces, verum super-nascentia, sicut multa alites: It was not needfull to conserue those Creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can liue vnder water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non buit, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. AUGUSTINE gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

Athen. dignosc. lib. 4. Plutar. in vita Demetrii. 2.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, lib. 5. c. 7.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischiefe and of ignorance, then of any reuerend reason, finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vpdoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of several kindes, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, eyther they were not in that age, or elsie it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyams, and the like; the one begotten by Ases and Mares, the other 50 by

by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discouering of strange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beasts and Birds differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke: And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and euen those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagnia, with which the Spaniards vsed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattell, and doe also oftentimes reare 10 a funder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men; but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, then the people of this part of the World. We also see it dayly, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcumbers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contayne of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance we cannot giue to the difference betwene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe.

Acq. h. i. Ind.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Og, 10 King of Basam, had beene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had beene Geometrical, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vpwads, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath beene nine foot long, and faire waightier and bigger then all Dauids bodie, who carried it away. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had beene vsed for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fixe Cubites of length, fixe of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot 40 vpright, and so must their Priests haue ascended by Steps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement, giuen in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steppes vnto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubites high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtlesse) might giue much the more capacite to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whercon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by 50 this meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantites be contained in a Vessell, of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large Bodies which were in the dayes of Noah might haue roome sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saued, (that is) (scuen of the cleane, two of the vnclane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, But hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubits, sheweth the whole Concanitie to haue bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the rooffe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubicall Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. feuerall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof feuen of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beasts cleane, and six and fiftie vnclene, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeces; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as a hundred and twentie Beeces. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as foure score Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threescore and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their feuerall Cabbinnes; their Meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betweene the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute: but he receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeeres before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Deekes and Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegarios) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this sayth Peterius, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disproue the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windores of Crystall to receiue in Light, and keepe our Water, were but to reuiewe the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all storie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah traualled to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were vitally mistaken. And I am not lesso to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularity; but doe herein ground my selfe on the Original and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke staied vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordaii in Armenia the greater. (as the words Gordai and Kardu, seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountaine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountaine in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Polomius calls Ociliis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordai, and Curtius Cordai: Ptolomius Gordai and Gordai: of which the Countrey next adioyning is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Nimada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milys, or rather Minni: which word is vsed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Nimins of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordienis or Gordeni. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Tibastis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 12. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill, from whence on euery side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus uabaque (Kubari). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called uabastiqu (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphan. l. 2. contr. Hæres. calls it uab: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to bee deriued; and Act. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra seru. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the rest adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

But there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest itselfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Bari, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeece, or in the yeece 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chush, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interiacent, which might by easie journeyes haue bene past ouer in twenty twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered it selfe, whichis eury where transpassable by boates of great burden: soas where the Defart on the one side resisted their expedition, theiuer on the contrary side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountains, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle it selfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprize of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riueris which imbroyder or compass it: for the effects witnessed their afflictions, and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first known Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeeres, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text :) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

The second argument, That the Easterne people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

FOR a second Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath bene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philoftratus in vita Apollonij Tiani. l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betwene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield. For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because hee brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whome they received the benefit. But it is true; that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Easterne world it was that Iohn Gutenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gersan a Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this myserie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Aegyptians or Phenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuil knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discouered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich trades therein: for the Chinians account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuositie in that little Kingdome of Perus, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other trauals & vnder takings. For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauielled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italie but as a barbarous Countrie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vttermost Angle and Island thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more saluage.

And

And of the Isle of Japan (now Zippingariz) Venetius maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & sapientie sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores accuratissimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: vnum cognoscunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant. The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be such by those who haue bene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and deuers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI-RAMIS found in the East Indies.

BUT for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to inuade India, to which hee adioyned also 50000. Horse, and 100000 Waggon: whereof if wee beleene but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countrie after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approued Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betwene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerful Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES, autis maioribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAUROBATES gathering together greater troupes then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had bene increased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance (this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurobates must haue bene made of stone, or somewhat else by mirade. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall bee demonstrated hereafter in the Storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonies sent thither had bene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if wee allow 65. yeeres time after the Flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabiah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: then thirty yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fife yeeres to his fife elder brothers, which make sixtie fife, and then twice thirtie yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty fife yeeres, there will then remaine sixe yeeres to haue bene spent in trauiailing from the East, ere they arrived in Shinar in the yeere after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arrived at Shinar in the yeere 101.: and the confusion to haue bene at Pelegis birth, these men doe all by mirade: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrads Tower in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require sound foundations) in the Plains of Shinar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could bee no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegis birth. And therefore it is farr more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLICAS) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus. Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colony was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleued, that Semirambates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperesse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the persons of NOAH.

Fourthly, it is no way propable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certaine habitation: No; it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which trauailes Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then covered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be found) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Tripoli; then into Spain, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italy, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say hee banished him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcians fables. For let euer reasonable man conceiue, what it was to trauaile firre in such a Forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either port or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vnderaken that vnbeleuung presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoever they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Calestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ischan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Ischan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of; although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Ischan, Hauilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Perjsia and the other adioyning adjoyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Hy, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ischan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which mooues me to beleue, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had hee not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giving himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth; after which, and his thanksgiuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIVS the Commentor vpon BEROSVS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested, as the Caspian and Cordæan hills which are three hundred miles asunder, and also some place of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annivus, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspj; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Cordæi, hee hath no other shift to vnit these opinions, but by vnitng those farre distant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error, which haue carefully ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographic, in which they are altogether disfigured. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills fve degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annivus withall: for in those the mountaines Caspj stand seven degrees to the East of the Cordæi, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annivus strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrantur verò omnes, non negligentia sed regnorum situs ignorantia; They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an inuention, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, hee beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagæ renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia the stocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth that the Embri before remembered (who were so called, because sliued from Dencalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANVM cum DVIRI & Galli progenitibus Embrorum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DVIRI and with the Galli the progenitours of the Embri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythijs tribuitur, Certainly, so the Primæ antiquitate of off-spring is alway giuento the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annivus, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Embri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annivus laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, hee saith a nation of Scythians called Araxe, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part

(to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part vterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, he therefore in the Promus of his Commentarie vpon Berosus, leaueh out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia siluatis, for Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the Mountaynes of Paropamisus, on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authoritie which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath 10 read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approoued and diligent Author be- ginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueh this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Sa- ga or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodo- tus) call all the Scythians, Saca which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that 20 name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueh. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longi- tude (thar is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Countrie about Araxes Pto- mie calleth Colibene and Saduceene and Sacape without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. feuerall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue seene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great dili- gence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea 30 est, que proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, & que ostia Oxæaninis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc vsq; ad Rha flu- minis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounde d on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaus Mountaines: on the North by vn- knowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdiani, and the Mar- gians, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que 40 magna sanè Regia est, & que innumeras nationes complectitur) Which is a great Region, com- prehendeth innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he discovereth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueh on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia both the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scy- thian Nations; neyther doth his fellow Frier Iohn Planconius (cited by Vincetius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Ar- menian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though after ward a Monk) euer acknow- 50 ledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Race: defended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of Pope Cle- ment the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracouia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traualled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving ma- ny things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he burieh that ancient and received received opinion, That out of the Mountaines Riphei, and Hyperborci in Scythia, spring the Riuer of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouing by vnanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Riuer are now by the Trade of Muscovia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The Riuer of Ta- nais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanoveero, in the great Wood Okenikiles or Leiphanolis. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rba, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fromon, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Riuer flow of 80-10 ryphenes (now Neper) and Dsuina or Diridna. And this famous Polonian doth in this fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscouians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanais or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretch- ing farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie cal- leth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Mathias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odde 20 yeers before his owne time: thefe be his words: Constat eam esse gentem nouam, & aduentitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late plantid Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gas new seates a litle more then 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Goths or Pouloei inha- bited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Mathias liued in the yeare 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeare 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested; and the Scythia Saca were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe 30 themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not one the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Iaxartes and Iactus; but what are these Scy- thians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?

†. VIII.

40 The first Argument, The Vine must grow naturally nere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not prob- able that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country: or Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such as Brennus and the Gauls inuaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, nere vnto the 50 Sonnes, where the continued along time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhahite that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italie.

Now it is manifest, that Noah traualled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plan- tation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to planta Vin- yard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiuing to God; and wherefoerer the Arke rested, there from thence upon the face of the whole earth.*

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare, saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written:
So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the West ward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem aedificauit, altissimam, quasi per eam caelum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if: they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens,

An answer to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

BEFORE I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may bee found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubur; saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doe not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first lay thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Moun-taines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Moun-taine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to prooue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Caenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same discription I see maketh mention of Masys, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordiean Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Iosephus (though out of Berossus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Caron by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountaines Gordiei was first borrowed out of Berossus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berossus, differs far from the wordes of that Berossus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annias. For Berossus cited by Iosephus, hath these wordes: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Codiaorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vis solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordiean Mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in stead of an amulet. But Annias his Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berossus vseth these wordes: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quiescit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tolleere quo maximè vniuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiean Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berossus writes Gordiei with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiei with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preservative against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approued Anthour: for one of them vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receiue from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolemie calls Gordiei, are not those Moun-taines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Molchici. These be his owne wordes: Montes Armenia nominantur ij, qui Molchici appellantur, qui protendantur vsq; ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Molchici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Paryedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordia or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordiean Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordia, otherwise Baris Kardu or Lubar, (which Ptolemie calleth Targodiaion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers with other, that haue scene the Mountaines of Armenia, find them farre interior, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolemie calls Olympus, now called Lucas, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene scene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: *Athos adambat latera Lemnia bouis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertop it. Again, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be scene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which Hæro-dotus: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, vt ad illius verticem oculi mortalium peruenire non possint: Ppon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is sayde to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discern the top thereof.
And if we may beleue Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which he ma-keth the most notorious both for breath and height: *Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aestium ad ortum sunt, acumine atq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vsq; ad continctum ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu; Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Moun-taine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, vsq; ad continctum (which is saith Macrobius) betwene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleue eyther:
for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canarie; which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes company at any such late hours, Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate colchis from iberia;

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountayne, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which sunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapesus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this storie we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Syblis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Townes: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselues doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiaz stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiazan, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which diuoyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and men in India be called Ararat.

LASTly, wee must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else wee must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar: or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spaines the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxis, Cassij Moschici, Amazonici, Hemiochi, Scythici, (thus diuerly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betwene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruaillous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disscuer: as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropanisus: hauing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they seuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which sunder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amannus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amannus to the mountaines on her West banke; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Tigris cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though betwene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves O-vantes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the River of Bagradas riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropanisus, and lastly of Caucasus, euen were the famous River of Indus with his principall companions Hydaspis and Zaradrius spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equall the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) that is, betwene Paropanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betwene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and River Imaus, and the Mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nysus or Nosh) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoscythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude are the most delicate Vines of the World, namely, in Iudea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equal bignes at Esfol. The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius winneth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Vine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

AND therefore to conculde this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also traueise Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name

name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hills, euen from Cilicia to Paroponius and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betwene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuacion of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it walseth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenum: betwene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betwene Athens and Asia, Egeum: betwene Sesius and Abydos, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontus, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedomycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plain (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrariety) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio in corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

Gen. 11. 31.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they obode: which prooueth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places wherefoeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Lothian, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after hee departed from Sechem, hee vseth these wordes: Afterwards removing thence vnto a Mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Beibet on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written. And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of To-gorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these traualles were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudea, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Calefyrans the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred 1010 calo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordian Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Vally of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordian Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar North-west, ninetic five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yer it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs. In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabae, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare say and by report, vi fertur, & vi dicitur, as Berosus and Niclaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all aduenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes; who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the Northwest, as Berosus first fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in quatrandanda isse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eam, rem sui ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (heest) telluris vir appellatur celebratusq; est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of prison of the Arke, wherinto God had committed him, to preferue him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repeopled.

S. I.

Whether SEM and HAM were elder then IAPHET.

F these Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Sem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the yongest: and herein the oppinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect given to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes so this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Genea, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vno SEM alio the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SEM alio the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne. So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Sem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of conjecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the six hundredth yeere (to wit) the hundredth yeere following, came the generall flood; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the flood, and in the six hundredth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so converted by the vulgar and Genea, Iunius turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminence of his birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and younger, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genea, who agree in this conuersion, Shem Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Pererius, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrarie, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, and begat Arphaxad two yeeres after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shem lived after he begat Eber, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwaies precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diners things that all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUt lets go vnto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene been borrowed thence, and therefore latter then it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Præme of his Chronologie: Moses is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Trojan warre; and farre before HERCULES, MVSÆVS, LINVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLYX, ÆSCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greeces haue feasted in the top and highest Turrets of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Ether, Cicero de Nat. Deorum 3. 3. whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Ægypto nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Ægypt, in the last dayes of CECROPIS, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but Tefens long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly De Cist. Dei. 1. 3. c. 11. proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alleging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

20	The SONNES OF IAPHET were,	{ Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshach, and Tiras.	{ Askenaz, Ripshath, Togorma.
			{ Elisba, Tarsish, Kittim, and Dodanim.

First, we are to consider, that the world after the Flood not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all aduventure, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authors, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus) in the fiction of Æneas or else to glorifie their owne Nations: Lets build heerein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery-where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull Vallies, with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our felues thereby, what wonderfull Desarts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirte yeres, these our grounds would not all ouer-grow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other offensive Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long & warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without controulement.

This being considered, it will appeare that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possesed; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the suddaine, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham the true successour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare hee traualled to Siechem in Palestina: and yet there had passed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neyther of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninive. Indeede the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Iluses of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeares were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Misraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in IAPHETS portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHETS sonnes TYBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

IO beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iaphet, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iaphets sonnes as to therest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phalegs birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the year after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iaphet were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegæum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut is off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young-ones adiacent.

Gen. 9. v. 27.

This partition and portion of Iaphet, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answered that blessing of God by Noah, Dilates Deus IAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciet) and not dilaret: and the Geneva persuades; yet the Septuagins haue dilates or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iaphet: noting not only an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iaphets sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if wee may beleue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Emili, Civitas, Italie: which also Funicus confirmeth in these words Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth year of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth year of the same NIMRODS Reigne TYBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Funicus himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded the Scriptures witness: But the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre; which the Sonnes of men builded. Lees then but alott a time sufficient for the making of Bricks to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would raise their Worke about fiftene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with Waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing; made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest; approued also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thibabur dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation; for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycon vpon Genesis giueh fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre; and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited: It is also to be noted, that vntill such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth; (that was) when they perceived not one another's speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newness of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year could creepe through 3000. miles of Desert, with Women, Children, and Cartell: let those light Beleevers; that neyther tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approuit; for I doe not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere such a time; (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeares; it were more then foolishness and madness to selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 157. yeares; and whereof they had spent some part in traualing from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana; and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeares (or be it but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers; and with abundant plenty of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supplied) be erected in those few yeares remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wives and Children, and Cartell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Boggs, and 40 Deserts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeares then of a 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entered the Countrey ten miles in ten yeares. And if Nimrod's people spent many yeares by the account before remembered in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lieth in 79. Degrees (the distance betweene those places, containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betweene Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the bodie of Biscay lieth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Austuria or Biscay is 60. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooke diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles; or (supposing that the Towre stood in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countreies less knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee understood of most part of the World else is vntknowne. And therefore did Annius will aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of Nim-

road. Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth one day, or Shall a Nation be borne one day. But may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iaphet might come by Sea; and so save this great Ravale through Cherts by Land. But we never reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely they that know what it is to imbarke to greata people as they may iudly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleave, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (wchally) their Cartell, by whose Milke they lived and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banqueting Dulces of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations, valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cartell: who had Flocks of Sheepe, and great Droves and Herds of their owne, and their own Sheep-herds, and Heardmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestine, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have ouergone Cenado, Palencia, and other Provinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibraltar, did many a Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countreys: and have fought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argentine there were scarce any Vessels that durd cross the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Jafan had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knows) and per chance such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and six Passengers, yet it was farre greater then any of the former times: Eratosthenes saith that Pyramus made use of a For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrans gave themselves of olde to farre-off Navigations, whence Tubal ascribed the invention of Ships unto them.

And for those Boates called longe naues; or Gallies, Plinie faith that Aegelas ascribeth the the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quing, Romi first to haue beene vied by Nesibion the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans seru'd themselves in the Punicke Warre. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly call the deuising of these Gallies on Selsitris; though Semiramis yfed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abraham time. So is said that Darius was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samostracians challenge the inuention; and yet Crullian (on the contrary) giues it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Aegyptians vied to coast the Shores of the Read Seappon raiftes, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time 4 of the Romans, the Brittains had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue scene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves excorsio circumfusa in Oceano Britanico (saith Textor.)

 of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in some particulars concerning the Arke, that there many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betweene the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Carrell: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now, when this Arte is come to her perfection, such Viouages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or six of Ships fit for any long Navigation: For if Gomer and Tubal 10 had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous tales, and all men else to their fancies, who haue call'd Nations into Countries far off: I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioyned both Nature, Reason, Politie; and necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

8. III. F.

20 Of GOG and MAGOG, TYBAL, and MESHECH, seated first about Asia
the lesse, out of EZECHIEL, CAP. 38. 40.

Now although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whether I hope I may be excused, if I differ at together from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hierosolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his reſtimonies for current, haue bene by him farre miſſe-led. But the better to concurre what Regions of the World comer the first sonne of Iaphet possit; as also Tabel, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, ſaith Marth Bernaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly; who in chaps. 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalians, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chief Conductor in their Attempts against Iſrael. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia; which Iaphet (Ilius possit, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them: And that those of the Issue of Iaphet (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were ſeſed herabout, it may best appeare, if we conſider the circumſtances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Propheſie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vniſiting of the two Kingdomes of Iſrael and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which Propheſie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purpoſed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose is written; And DAVID my ſeruant ſhall ſit King ouer them; and they ſhall haue one Sheppard, (that is) they ſhall be vniſted as they were in *DAVID*s time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth againſt thoſe Nations, which ſhould ſeek to impeach this Vnion, and diſturb the people of Iſrael, whom God purpoſed to reſtore to grace, and to promiſed to reſtore. And ſo in the ſame Chapter are thoſe Nations coupled together, which inſeſted the Iſraelites after their returne, and ſought to ſubiet them: all which were the Subjects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Caeſeyrians, next bordering Paſtina, or the holy Land, followed alſo by the reſt of the Nations of Asia the leſſe, which lay North from Iudaea. The words of Ezechiel are theſe: Some of man, ſit thy face againſt Gog, and againſt the Land of Magog, the chief Princes of MESECH (Or MOSECH and TUBAL: and afterward; Rebeld, I come againſt the chief Prince of MESECH and TUBAL: and in the ſixth verſe; GOMER and all his Bands, and the Hoſte of TOGORMA of the North quarters: Herein Ezechiel hauing firſt deliuered the

p. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGOMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

It turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: yet because the Land was Defart and over-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes: As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldaea, downe the River of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldaea, might by the same River get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came in to that Valley and stayed nor in the East) were for awhile opprest, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hanielah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Chush, took both bankes of Tigris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall fear of which Region of Hanielah or Sufian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Susa. Chush himselfe took the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-westward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Defart, where Ptolemie placeth the Cite of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felice, had Tigris to convey them into the Persian gulf, which watheth the bankes of Arabia felice on the East side: so as those sonnes of Chush might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Cite of Ninive was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tigris; and from thence a Colonie past to Charan, standing also upon a navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and took their seares in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog and Tubal, sate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places; as to the Mountaynes about Albania (called Cymmerine) and to the Cite of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosporus Cymmerius took appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Cite of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Ciberion; but Ciberion was a Towne in Campania, fo called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolemie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Meschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaynes Meschici, and the Mountaynes Parjardes: out of whose North part sprinketh the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in proceesse of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth.

forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his parents & kindred. The Togormians were also called Gibles, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Malons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one, Hierosolimitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the prophetic of Ezechiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to shy Fayres horses, and busse-men, and mules, which could not well bee driven ouer the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages; and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards, but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscouia. But for these subderinations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discover, and thercin to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And thus we must Note, that those grand children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had notherfore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardlie knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who took on them the Conduccion and Dominion, ouer the rest.

From Madai the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Gracians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Melch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex eis qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, in Graciam; And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Genea here vseth the word (Tarsibis) for Tarsus, a Cite in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Genea vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italie and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashion of that supposition, who so many yeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Thessalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciously received by Erichon, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee received two sonnes, Ion, and Acheus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Thales) who, when he had ioyned Megarato Attica, erected a pillar in that gulf, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hec non sunt Peloponnesus, sed Ionia; These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecateus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asiathe lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof then hee learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecateus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the needest way, leaving his owne name to some maritime Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleueed, that Dania took the name from Ison the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto the, which they held for diuers yerres. And howsoever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanitie therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betwixt the Scythians and the Aegyptians, as Iustine out of Trogus, in the war between Ptolemy of Aegypt, and Tanaus of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reigne of Ninus; and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all salvage without law or religion, liuing like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) liued together with Moses.

Lib. 18. de Civ.
Dei, c. 10.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosoch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gag the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwixt Meshech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosoch) the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuersly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the sonne of Aram; Mes, the Genesis, Mash, Iunius, Meshech. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that either Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gave name to that Province wherein David hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the sonne of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) vseth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habitum tanquam Scenite Kedareni: The Septuagint giues it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est; habitum cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asiaticis, habitum cum tabernaculis Arabum: O wretch, that I am, for I haue traueiled among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soeuer confusion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petrea; and the Chaldean putteth Asia in stead of Meshech, but the Hebrew it self hath Meshech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Meshech the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Meshech or Mash, both bordering Iudea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Meshech and Tubal. But as for those that take Meshech out of the word Mosoch (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Muscouian: sure they presume much vpon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that David neuer traueiled so farre North; (for to him Muscouia was vtterly vnknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a Citie on the Mountaines of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arius Montanus makes Mosoch the father of the Muscouians: and herein also Melancthon runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Meshech in Muscouia, though with some better aduce of iudgement; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, Hei mihi quid exulo in Meshech to signifie, Genis eius seruauem in signem esse: That the seruice of that Nation exceeded: which feruente or brutallie of the Muscouians, David neuer proued, or (perchance) neuer heard of. But the same feritie or crueltie which those Northern Muscouians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Countie tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equal fiercenesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people:) the same being foretold by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desert (saith Plinie) confronteth the Arabians Cochles on the East, and the Cedraei Southward, both which ioine together vpon the Nababates. So it appeareth before before) that Meshech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel; and that Kedar also did ioine to Meshech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the Successors of Seleneus, enemies of the re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But (as I haue already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation the issue of Meshech (or Mosoch) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountaines Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Muscouia, and so al opinions saved. But all salvage Nations ouer-growne and vncultivated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as Ciuilitie, Letters, and magnificent Building, witnesseth antiquitie. Tiras, the leuenth sonne of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthe the examination) affirme. Iosephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, which were three, of Ascanes and Riphath, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Gen. 25. 13.

Ascanes, Riphath, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Ascanes was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason why.

Eusebius makes Ascanes the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their expositions are commonly very idle. Plinie findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Riuer of Hylas and Cios: Melancthon being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscomes were descended of the Ascanes, (for Tuiscomes saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, preposito articulo die Ascanes;) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not farre from Phrygia was the lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succor of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, O humeris q. Deo similis, in facie et bodie like one of the Gods. Virgil also remembreth such a Riuer, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, transq. sonantem a Riuer, together with the Hills Gargara, and the roaring Ascanius. But this Plinie maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillium vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Myfia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanes he directvs to finde by the description of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countie of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, euen betwixt Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanes to be the inhabitants of Pomus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Verbis makes it a Citie of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolome witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Myfia, neere vnto Cio; which also agreeth with Plinie. For Plinie findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, whether these places tooke name of Ascanes the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Aeneas sonne, who was then cyther exceeding yong, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the Countie whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myfia; but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremie is called Ascanes, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which decerne not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremie wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascanes were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nation against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes. C. 51. v. 27.

against her, yc. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountaines of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Jacob and Eſau, and call it Aram-padan. Thn if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Aſcanes ioyned with them (who altogether vniued vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Aſkenas Germanie or Almaine, for we heare of no ſwarth Ruttiers at that ſiege. But the Aſkenas were of thoſe Nations which were either ſubiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the diſperſion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Josephus, who calls them Rhegiis; or of the Troes, who will haue them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphat the ſecond ſonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the reſt of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I ſee nothing to the contrary, but that hee might ſeate himſelfe with the reſt of his Family: for there wanted no room or ſoile in thoſe dayes for all the ſonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well vnderſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphat, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Josephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Riphei (ſaith Melanchton) ſignifieth Giants. Theſe people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti. The greateſt number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who ſpake the ancient Polac: which being firſt called Riphei (for the loue of ſome of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a cuſtome exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer wiſeſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when theſe Riphei (afterward Heneti) fought new Regions, they came along the ſhores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Ruſſia, Lituania, and Polonia. From thence they croſt thwart the Land, and peopled ſyria, deſirous (ſaith Melanchton) of a warmer ſoile of fruit and Wine. Theſe Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Venedicus is found in Ruſſia. This Nation, after they were poſſeſt of Lituania and Polonia, diſturb'd the plantation of the Boij and Hermondurij. Therefore, it ſeemeth to me, that of Riphat, came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and ſo thinke Arias Montanus, firſt ſeared in Paphlagonia; but in courſe of time Lords of Sarmatia, and thoſe other parts before remembred, chiefly betweene the Rivers of Viſtula and Albis. The name (ſaith Melanchton) ſignifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by White-meates and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the firſt Ages.

Of the third ſonne of Gomer, Togorma, I haue ſpoken already; now therefore of Iuans children, which were foure:

Elifa, Tharſis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of the ſome ſonnes of Iauan: and of the double ſignification of Tharſis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

ELISA or ELIPHA, came the Aeoles: and of this Elifa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, ſaith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elifa the Father of the Aeoles in Aſia ſide: others of Elis in Peloponneſus; or of both. And ſeeing the Greekes were deſcended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Aeoles and the Elis took name of Elifa, his eldeſt Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. ſpeaking of Tyre, nameth the Iſles of Elifa, Hyacinthus by purpura de inſulis Elifa facta (unt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple brought from the Iſles of Elifa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elifa write Italia: but the Pulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneſis, and Iunius, keep the word Elifa: and ſo I thinke they might doe with reaſon. For there was not found any ſuch Purple Dye in Italia in thoſe dayes, nor ſince, that I can reaſe of: but thoſe Iſles of Elifa, were by a better coniecture the Iſles of Greece, and the beſt Purple was found afterward at Tyre it ſelfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coaſt of Getulia.

Tharſis, the ſecond Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharſis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharſis in Cilicia, vnderſtands Carthage in Africa; but (reſeſering the reſpect due to ſo learned a man) he was much miſtaken in that coniecture. The Chaldean Paraphraſt puts Carthage for Tharſis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reaſon therein. So likewiſe, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharſis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphraſt tranſlates Tharſis (Africa). But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Eſion Gaber, in the Bay of Elanu, neere vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petraea, Idumaea, or of the Chusites; and they ſayled to the higher part of the Eaſt India. For it had beene a ſtrange Navigation to haue ſpent three yeeres in the paſſage betweene Indea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue beene ſayled in fixe or ten daies. And if ſo great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, al the other neighbouring Princes would ſoon haue entermain'd that Trade alſo. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this ſort written of in the firſt of Kings: Alſo King Salomon made a Nauie of Ships in Eſion Gaber, which is beſide Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram ſent with the Nauie his ſeruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the ſeruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and ſet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vſed for the Sea in generall) ſo, becauſe the Iſraelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea then that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharſis had the greateſt Shippes, and were the firſt Navigators in thoſe parts with ſuch Veſſels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharſis vſed often for the Sea. And whereas it is ſaid that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharſis, that phraſe is not ſtrange at all; for we vſe it ordinarily whereſoeuer we navigate, (namely) 30 that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are ſet out euery yeere, or euery three yeeres to the Sea, and therefore Tharſis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vſed for the Sea it ſelfe. But in this place Tharſis is truly taken for Tharſis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharſis the ſecond ſonne of Iauan, or by his Succellors in memorie of their firſt parent. To this Citie arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the firſt ouerthrow to Darius, and caſting himſelfe into the Riuer to bathe and waſhe his bodie, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharſis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeeth with the reaſon and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other ſonnes inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who was to paſſe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the ſame Coaſt, and firſt planted the Iones on that ſhore: gaue the Iſlands betweene Aſia the leſſe and Greece, to Elifa, and left Tharſis vpon the Sea ſide in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third ſonne of Iauan was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, ſaith Beroaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (ſaith he) and ſignifieth percussores, though in that reſpect it may be meant by either. But it ſeemeth more probable, that the place of Elifa, 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Haec calamitas ab Elia predicta eſt, qui capite viceſimo tertio inquit, venenos eſſe euſorſores Tyri ex terra Cithim, This calamitie (ſaith Melanchton) was foreſhewed by Elia the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Deſtroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cithim. And although the children of Iſrael eſteemed all men Iſlanders, which came to them by Sea, and ſeparate from that Continent; (and ſo alſo Cithim might be taken for Italia, ſaith Beroaldus) yet we muſt take the firſt performance of the former Propheſie, which tooke effect by the deſtruction of the Tyrans by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths ſiege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces ſeauen thouſand principall Citizens; ſtrangled two thouſand, and changed the freedome of 13. thouſand others into bondage and ſlauey. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainlie in the firſt of the Marchabees, in theſe words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) thereremained the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius) which Citie Ptolemy vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the yongest Brother (by the most opinions) 10 late downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodana, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Eliza, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodana, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posteritie might giue it that name in the memorie of their first parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, 20 Riuers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeeres after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by whose memories, out of what branch the milshes were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuers, as to things (after their iudgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbor 30 Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meserch, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldaea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sonnes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) travelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards 40 the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the case of Chus, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the case of Chus.

IHat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Iacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great Citie in Thebaide, called Cherami: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will add some farther proofe to the former. For the manifestation hereof, 10 sens many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and (senseless) interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (so wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first late downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controvertie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Mos: his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Ethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, tinerth 20 that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and friends, with the Citie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Ethiopian Citie Meot, which he saith at length Cambyzes called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desideret exercitum otiosum 20000 Anig. l. 2. c. 5. ferre, hinc non audente manus conferre, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum Regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to hand strokes, there 30 happened this accident in the meane while. The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, whoat some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, she made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest servants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife: which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the Citie into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it selfe to haue beene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabaeans are Arabians and not Ethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And 50 though Damianus a Goos speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prestre Iohn, of the Abyssines: wherein that Ethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sishac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, so haue beene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and neere Esfon Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumaea ioyneth to the Tribe of Inda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly liued fortie yeeres: where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Aethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, and draue the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Aethiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so ²⁰ it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Aethiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to haue passed ³⁰ through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that faoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered fortie yeeres, and did by these late traualles of his, seek to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God before he brought them to the Land of plentie and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatrie, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those he might receive fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods ⁴⁰ Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also saith, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things fained by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Aethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Chus will expounded for Aethiopia, Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chus is by the Septuagint conuerted Aethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Aethiopia: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Aethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Aethiopia, Behold (saith Ezechiel), speaking of the person of this great Assyrian I come ⁵⁰ upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Seuenh, even to the borders of the blacke Moors: which last words should haue bene thus conuerted: From the Tower of Seuenh to the borders of the Chus or Arabians: betweene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seuenh to the Aethiopians, hath no sense at all. Seuenh is selfe beeing the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Aethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor's conquest had bene but betweene Seuenh and the border of Aethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory then the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreys ioyn together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland; for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by thesetwo bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seuenh or Syene is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Aethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entred into any part of Aethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Aethiopia for Chus.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap 30. vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: In die illa egredientur nuncij a facie mea in triuivium ad conterendum Aethiopia confidendum: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans: In that day shall there ²⁰ Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moors afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chus or Arabia for Aethiopia or the blacke Moors, euery man may see which meanely vnderstandeth the Geographie of the World, knowing, that to passe out of Egypt into Aethiopia there neede no Gallies nor ships, no more then to ³⁰ passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Aethiopia being the conterminat Region with Egypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stonie (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Armie might thereby surprise them vnwares in their securitie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seuenh within a mile of Aethiopia, he neede neither Gallie nor Ship to passe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one In-land shire is parted from another; and if hee had a ⁴⁰ fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleasure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepe Mountaines) called Catadupa Nilis, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse, Iauan and his sons in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning, Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grandchildren of Chus from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguous vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Aethiopian blacke Moors, as is already remembered in the Chapter ⁵⁰ of Paradise.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chus for Aethiopia.

And as in these places before remembered, so in diuers other is the word Aethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the storie (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square; one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of of Scripture, Eſay 18. Ve terra Cymbalorum alarum que est trans flumina Aethiopia, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Ve terra nauium alarum que est trans fluvios Aethiopia? woe to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia, sending Embassadors by sea, even the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Ve terra umbrifera; woe to the Land of the shade coast, saith Iunius. The former Translators understand it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significantly called the wings of the ships, the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Eſay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israhelites which Eſay repeateth, and by the former translation every man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Aethiopia, and Aethiopia set next vnto Iudaea, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeede that lyeth betwene Iudaea and Egypt, and not Aethiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet spake, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia: Nam de ynota regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknowne Region. Now if Aethiopia it selfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Iewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dreame that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia? except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or vied an impertinent discourse of those nations, which were not discovered in 2000. yeeres after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bonaesperanza.

†. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Tethaca in the storie of Senacherib, and Zera in the storie of Ala are unadvisedly made *Aethiopian*s.

And by this translation is the storie of Senacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his terrair. For Senacherib was first repulled at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudaea; when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhakeh, (which all the Iace: prates call King of Aethiopia) was on the way to sit on him, he began to with-draw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Armie in two parts, hee sent threatening Messengers to Ezechias King of Iuda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set downe in the second of Kings in these words: Hume any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? where is the god of Hamath? &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Ierusalem, he then meant to haue vnted that great Armie before Ierusalem, commanded by Rabshekeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great Citie vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Iudaea and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Iosephus calls Tharſaces) Rabshekeh hastened from the siege of Ierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whom hee least feared, trook his Armie before Ierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Armie of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For he confesseth in the tenth Booke the first Chapter of the Iewes Antiquities, that it was come to *Senacherib*s knowledge, that the Armie which was a foot (sooth to releece the Egyptians and the Iewes) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now the Desert which lay indifferent betwene Ierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit, the Stonie, of which it is a part: the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Ierusalem. But that there is any Desert betwene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet bene heard of or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Aethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse.

He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Aethiopia &c. whereas it should haue bene thus conuerted with Iunius: Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chushi; Hee heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whole Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoake of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their neereſt Neighbours: and so were not the Aethiopian black-Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discouereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Aethiopia then Zera was, who invaded Aſia King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeede, how such an Armie & those Chariots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer such strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these *Aethiopian*s such trauailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King *Zera*s also called King of Aethiopia. But the word Chush being first conuerted for Aethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or invasions) followed one another in their former mistakings.

†. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Eſay 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Nauium alarum; Winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalorum alarum (according to the Latine) ſayles whistling in the windes, or terra umbrifera (after Iunius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, is our Engliſh Genes hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sails are commonly called the wings of a ships and we use to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that the wanteth wings: (that is) when her sails are either worne or too narrow; and we also vſe the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sails were said to giue a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Eſay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabul) doth signifie both to shadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others a safeguard, vnder the shadow of thy wings, which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vſed, as in the sixteenth Psalm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegeme; Defend me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boates of reeds (spoken of are of two kindes; either of basket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

THE second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first posselt Chaldea on the West side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as hee increased in people, hee entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-east-side of Iudaea. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Canaan held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these foure brothers posselt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterranean Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petrea, all Canaan which embraceth Galilee, Samarita, and Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased, and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) as well in Assyria, Syria, and Aegypt might be possessed before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnesse of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Aegypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis. d by Iustine) Aegypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For theie be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Entre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Aegypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesseth, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbeth the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for foreigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Aegypt was possessed by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be effected a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not onely Babylon and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Aegypt, Palestina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprist, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood? euen necessitie, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spred ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wher in if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sparing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or elchew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this enuious old Age of the World mingled together, and sowed with the seeds of Mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annianus may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated neere Lybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Aegypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annianus his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum diligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts; That there were dwelling at Iherusalem Taxes: men that feared God of every Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to traualle ouer before the Flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Atica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres after Ozges Flood; whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) inclosed for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, then after the generall outflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, wherein Pererius grounded his opinion.

LASTLY, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur eadem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: for out of this (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never bene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not haue sustained those numbers with their increase for any longtime: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Syria, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleue Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spain, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 166. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chief strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was overflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Libya.

THEREFORE, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator nor Iudge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillers or Altars (of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians having added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inferred. And that the memory of Antiquity was in such sort preferred, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the use of Letters and the Art of Astro-nomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christs coming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferior Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Sennacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Dispolis: in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Morsin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmeth that it had once the name of Thebais.

10 Plus the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya: whose people were anciently called Phutai, (saith Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the River Fut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chubb and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen Sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen Sonnes.

CANAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romans Galilaea in the Scriptures Galilaea, Samaria, and Iudea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Ascalon, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Laspha. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East; and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the Sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrie, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebusi or Jebuseus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgasi or Girgesens.
6. Heth or Chineus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sineus.
9. Araadi or Aradaus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chamathus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hethites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

ZIDON the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Affer: for Affer, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Afferites could never obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Hevites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarab buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakims were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusam, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their Citie and the Countrey neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basun) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Celestria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the 30 Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites, and Harkites.

The fift sonne of Canaan was Gergesius or Gergesum, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomie lieth the Citie Gerula, which Iosephus calls Gersera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ disposedst the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the euill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesius also built Berytus (sometime Geru) afterward Felix Iulias, three miles from the River Adonis in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heneus the sixth sonne, and Father of the Hevites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphborim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosus, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times 50 ferued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to proue Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh sonne was Araceus or Harki, who betwene the foote of Libanus and the Mediterranean Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Citie, of Arches, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

t. V.

t. V.

Of Sini and Aradi.

Since the eight son, Hieronymus sets at Caparysa, which Ptolomie findes in Iudaea, nor farre from Telus: to the South thereof, faith Ianinus. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolemie, Sinijra: Mela and Plinie, Sinijra; Brochard, Sylon, (called Synichis) neere Aeca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sini, or thereabout; but heere there is no other certaine then the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenas) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cini were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims; beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cini, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth sonne was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the Citie Gul Tyr. Viz. Arados: opposite against which Iland on the Maine of Phoenicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (faith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembereth in his prophecies against the Tyrinians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arad were thy Mariners.

Of Zemari.

OF Samarus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Celestria at Edessa, and founded Samarium, which in Iosus is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samaragim (of the same Orthographie) vpon the Mountaines of Ephraim (faith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuerteth amisse (faith he) by Semerom. The Hieronymitan Paraphrast makes Samarus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Plinie calls the Hemisseni, in Celestria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaris, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samaris or Shemerom of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaris. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base, for as long as the state of the Jemes stood vp, they alwaies called themselves Jemes: when it suffered or sank, they then vterly denied to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

Of Hamathi.

The last of Canaans sonnes was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (faith Beroaldus), of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathus was present. Iosephus and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch with standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena: betwene the Mountayne Castus and the Province of Pertia, and Selencia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betwene Apamea

Apamea and Emesa in Cassotis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Oronates, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betwene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon is selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnposselt, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Hermon, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because Dauid accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did theret. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Hermon, which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the Citie in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and for the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Affedim: which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amatheos, and the people Cap. xij. 12. Amathin: of which (as I take it) Rabshakeh vaueth in the second of Kings: where is the god of Hamath?

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanus): his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schim. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma posselt both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooketh that part toward the Red Sea, as neerest his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Plinie: Saba Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad utraq. maria porrecti sunt gentibus habitant; The Sabaean people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to witte) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrey was after wards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Poissellus. To this agreeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Sabia: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomie, because because he remembreth a Nation called Seabei neere the Persian Sea; and Massabatha which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Aethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it strange, that the Sabei, which stole away Iobs Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and finde out Iob in Tracomicia, betwene Palastina and Celestiria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabei on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the stealth upon Iob, which soeuer Beroaldus shall take for needreft. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Desart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated: the same which Ptolomie calls Sane, now Semiscasac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Desart, came those Magi or Wise men which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wise men doe beleene, but out of Sabia in Arabia the Desart: which Citie when my selfe was there, was (as I iudged it) called Semiscasac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabei were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to inuade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Desarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe 20 them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Vbi nec homines, nec bestie videntur, nec arbes, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non vifum tantum saxosi, altissimi, asperum; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but onely sharpe, and high stonie, and cragie mountaines. Beroaldus and Perrinus conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabei on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Eson Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre traualle enter his Territories, free from all danger of surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Desart: onely Hamilab and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomie; who withall nameth Sabatole, within the walls whereof there were sometimes found fixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Aethiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Aethiopians Ashahari, they be not worthy any farther answer then hath already beene giuen: especially seeing these Cities preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Desart is found the Citie Saba or Sane, (now Semiscasac) with the Citie of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the happye is found the Citie of Rhegana, and Rabana; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Sapah, not farre from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabattha; and to the West of Sabattha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabei: and to the South thereof againe toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hamilab by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom hee might passe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, set neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolomies time.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush to haue beene seated in the west Æthiopia, disproued out of Ezechiel: and Hieremie.

AND whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious heerein) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about four thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne *Æthiopi*ans neuer faw cloth, till the Portugalls seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Cinnamon, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne only by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Æthiopia, which inhabite about *Serra Lio*na, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan all dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Fly, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Elam vpon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Prouince of Arabia Petraea; and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petraea, the seat of his Grand-father Chush; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand vpon Edom, and the Idumeans, as they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

Ezech cap. 15. vers. 15.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFTER Chush it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith S. Augustine) were plural, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and therest of his brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim; and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come vp ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Ægyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phis & Lud are ioyned together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush; (which were the Chushites) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Ægyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lybians. And I beleue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat nearer the word Lybians, and by which it may seeme that the true writing writing is, not Lybians, but Lybians. Neither is it heere to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Citie (saith he) between Ægypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike if the Citie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Aenes of the palsy) standeth nere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet is it not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Selenus, and Antiochus, many Citie called Alexandria, Selenia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lebani to be the Father of Lybia, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Possellus; and either opinion may be true.

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plural number, as anim of the dust.

Cap. 46. v. 9.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countreies giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Cassubim and Caphorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Philisti.

Their Cassubim inhabited Cassotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Cassius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphorim seated nere Cassubim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethrotis, not farre from pelajum. Strabo calls it Sethrotis; Stephanus and Plinie, Sethrotis, of the Citie Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptoleme calls Hercules parua. Of the Cassubim and Caphorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyls (which is Alienigena, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vie the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph.) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gasei, Ascalonites, Asotij, Gethai, and Accaronites. Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Citie the Countrey adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham wife; with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Caste of Pilgrims (otherwise Cesarea Palestina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Ægypt. The Anakis or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth one of the fiue Cities aboue named. They had sometimes fiue Kings, saith Lyranus. They mastered the Israelites at severall times about 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by Dauid, and laid on themselves. It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countreies adioyning, were held by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Isa, yet at the time of the promise it was possesse by the Canaanites, as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Heutes dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphor. Hier. 47. 4. tor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphorim; Hane not I brought vp Israel out of the land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphor, and Aram from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuersion Berwald condemneth; where Caphor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Ægypt, betwene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Iunius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Genea.

But

Cap. 16. v. 9.

But Pererius calls Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palestina, and north that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Seihreites, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly knowne: And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Togiasphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hence it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

§. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

He posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them hee proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsing their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nimueh) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also reacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauing India) which I beleeue Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Opbir and Hauilah the sonnes of Lothan afterward repayed. His filij Sem ab Euphrate flumio partem Asiae usq. ad Oceanum indicum tenuerunt: These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Is. Ant. l. 1. c. 7

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia: which name then began to be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witness Daniel.) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, and seated in the border of Susiana. Assur (as most Historians beleeue) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nimueh of equal beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath bene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoyle the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfulest Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vmoft of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them? whom my Fathers haue destroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telasar. where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haramin in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Ituraa, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Aegypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldaans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldaans about Ur: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Shem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fifth and last Sonne of Shem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damasius was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrius (saith Eusebius Esay 7. v. 8. out of Iosephus) which Syria liued before Moses was borne; the same which others call the sonne of Apollon. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajin, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum flumiorum, Syria compassed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mother: and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witnesse: Quos nos Syros vocamus, Syri Arameos & Arameos vocant: Those which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Arameians and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some, one of note; Kemuel, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel Posteritie could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharajin, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Amecobaritis (so called from the River Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajin (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were, { Vz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and
*Mes*ch or Mes.

Hieron. in trad. l' d'raie. Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that Citie, saith Iosephus and S. Hierome. But Tostatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Elzezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desart, and to Batanea or Tracensis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter 10 of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is feared beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracensis, adioyning to Bisan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Seir to the East, Elat to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Citie and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hus, the sonne of Nabor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Iacob, saith Philo.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disproue, though I see no reason why Gether should 20 leave the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Itolomy setteth the Citie of Cholle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies keepe the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassiotis, and Selencis, where Protonie placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or *Mes*ch the North part of Syria, betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Mafius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no other- 30 wise be knowne then by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newlie planted, nor in many hundred yeeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desart parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, let them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, and to themselves; giuing to the Citie therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their 40 memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and displaining the greatesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nona Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countreies are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. §. 7. Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Maonians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Iocan: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth diuided. 50

t. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Shem.

THe many people which at the diuision (at Phaleg's birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at cyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Flood, ere the children of Noah seuered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeeres as 101. (the time of Phaleg's birth) 10 so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the Familie of Iacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing received the blessing of God, Increase and multiplie, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeeres of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg took that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phaleg's death (which hapned in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeeres: in the 43. yeere of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeeres before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was 120. the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Arius King of Arabia a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq. armis prestant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Citie in Armenia, received Bazarnis into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betwene Nilus and Tanais, the Assyrians, Phenicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoraster and others: and Zoraster on the other side, who made resistance with 30 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the vncertain instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoever mens opinions haue bene here in, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the 40 worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Flood, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinar, or tenn yeeres after hee arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Iacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esaú; and that 50 Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if hee had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophecie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooffe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag rooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IIII.

Of the sonnes of Iochan, the other sonne of Heber.

The sonnes of Iochan were

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Shaleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iaraab, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vxal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chasila, and
13. Iobab.

Althoſe ſonnes of Iochan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the Eaſt parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choaſ, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

Gen. 10. v. 30. But the certaine places of thoſe thirteen Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Mofes being generall: And there dwelling was from Meſſia as thou goeſt vnto Separ a Mount in the Eaſt. Of all theſe thirteen Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whoſe names, to auoid confuſion, it is to be obſerued, that among the ſonnes of Chuſh, two of them had alſo the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had alſo a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-childe by his wife Keturah. But Seba the ſonne of Chuſh, and Sheba the ſonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the ſon of Chuſh vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-childe of Abraham was (as ſome haue thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Persia: of which Nations Dionyſius de Orbis ſitu, maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; poſt hos ſunt Paſſagarda; prope verò hos ſunt Taſci. The firſt are Sabæans: after theſe be Paſſagarda; and neere theſe the Taſci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſonne (while he yet liued) Eaſtward to the Eaſt-Country: heereupon it is ſuppoſed, that this Saba the ſonne of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the ſouthermoſt Eaſt-Country in reſpect of Iudea, which alſo Ouid ſetteth vnder the Sun riſing. Yet ſeeing the reſt of Abraham's ſonnes feared themſelues on the borders of Iudea, I rather chooſe to leaue Saba the ſonne of Abraham in Arabia the Deſart, where Ptolomie ſetteth a Citie of that name.

Gen. 25. v. 5. But Saba the ſonne of Iochan, the ſon of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it ſelfe. For Dionyſius Afer in his Periegeſis, (or deſcription of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verſe, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilis inter medios habitas, Sabæus: In the middleſt of theſe dwell the Sabæi; and the Taxili, ſayth this Dionyſius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Iochan's ſonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir alſo was an Inhabitant of the Eaſt India, and (as Saint Hierome vnderſtands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now knowne by the name of Molucca. Iosephus vnderſtands Ophir to be one of thoſe great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherſoneſi, or Peninſula: of which there are two very noxious; Calicut, and Malacoe. Pererinus takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther Eaſt.

Arius Montanus out of the ſecond of Chronicles, the third Chapter and ſixth Verſe, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the Weſt Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the ſecond of the Chronicles at theſe: And hee overlaid the houſe with precious ſtones for beantie; and the gold was gold of Parauaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Mofes in the deſcription of Paradiſe: And the gold of that Land is good: ſi- Gen. 2. 11. & ding a Towne in Characene a Prouince of Suſiana called Barbatia; ſo called (as he thinks) 2 Tim. li. c. 22. by corruption for Parauaim: from whence thoſe Kings ſubiected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this ſancie of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Pleſius, who alſo rooke Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubiect of no further diſpute; it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: ſure I am that at leaſt America hath none, no not any Citie, Village, or Mountaine ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcouered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Atabalipa commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferiour to none) ſome of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderſtood them, ſet it downe in the Diurnall of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer ſince as diuers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Jeſuite in his naturall and morall Hiſtorie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) rooke that name of Iochan, who as hee ſuppoſeth nauigated from the vtmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Iucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Countrey, but [What is that] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards aſked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What aſke you, or What ſay you: The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Countrey on the South ſide of Trinidad & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcouered, pointed to the Hills a ſtarre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Straite of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South, and ſo hath that Countrey euer ſince retained the name of Paria.

40 The ſame hapned among the Engliſh, which I ſent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my people aſked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay as, You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The ſame hapned to the Spaniards in aſking the name of the Iland Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that elſe place which the Sea incompaſſed, they answered, Cari, which ſignifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newlie diſcouered bene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee muſt leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now althoough there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelfe (towards Persia) in Hauilah; now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore, yet the greateſt plenty is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the Eaſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Salomons ſhips made from the Red Sea (which was three yeeres in going and coming) it ſeemeth they went to the vttermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeepe theſe that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that nauigation in two yeeres, and ſometimes leſſe: and Salomons ſhips went not about a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But wee muſt conſider, that they euermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vſe of the Compaſſe was knowne, it was impoſſible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ſhips could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not beene for the plentie of gold in the East India lands, farre above the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and thereto haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those lands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas hee had no coast to haue guided him.

Tolstus also gathereth a fantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whole Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Solinus affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatica, in these wordes: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluent, Griffes tenent uniuersa, alites ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue bene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Palerius Flaccus: & D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vied to weare a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreme North, at a place called Gysitron, or the Cae of the Northeast winde. Forthermost, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be faired in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold; inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength bee very great) he shall be faine to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seek to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their yong-ones, they grow iraged and aduenturous. Inlike sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Aegyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Peales which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde saueur in the fish and blood of the Indians, whom they deuoure.

† VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mafus and Sephur named to the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the lands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Pisim compasseth, was so called of Hauilah, the sonne of Chisus as formerly proposed by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou commenst to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul euer made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude; that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these thirte, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir; though at the first feared by their brethren about the hill Mafus or Mesb, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betweene Cilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues remooued into the East India, leaving the other other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mesb vnto Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America; those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountaine of Mafus in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charrah: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses, Sipphara by Ptolomie, standing to the East of the Mountaine Mafus; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beaume and riches thereof. But this was in proceesse of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vied: as in Numbers 21. Balaac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie;) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarraim, to curse thee: for Aram Nabarraim was Syria sinuorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture, the Guides which I haue followed herein and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publique, other then the discouery of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vnture reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darke forgetfulness ought to haue buried; and covered ouer for euermore. And although the length and dissolving Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the four steps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath bene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Foanders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

I followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitic and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings; and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vied both for the Magistrat, and for thofe of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the eleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouernour ouer them : the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Gracians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation : Apud Lacedamonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, vi sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes ; Among the Lacedamonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen : and againe, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum ; If reason and aduise-ment were not in old men, our Ancesters had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

Gour-

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernors or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion : signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two : the one, Potestas aut imperium ; Power or command : the other, Proprietas aut dominium ; Proprietie or Mastership : the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slave. Ad Casarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietates ; Cesar hath power ouer all ; and euery man proprietie in his owne : and againe, Cesar omnis imperio possidet, singuli dominio ; Cesar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increafe : so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, vtterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habituall) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was seuered from power, and strength from charitie : Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortal) made both the Wife & Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty then themselves : the feeble fell vnder the forcible ; and the equall from equall received equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proved vpon a better tryall, no lesse perillous then an vndurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing : so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corosue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which invented, and the same Reason which appoied souereigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasures and Hangmen : measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings ; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur : arbitria principum pro legibus erant ; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the wils of Princes : Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt ; Love sees one while too much, another while starke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established : and that gouernment which had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an euen ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Piccor) Principes, quia iustitiant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & dii sūt. De aurore scilicet part. 1. Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince, the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most high beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoever hee Dan. 5. 21. pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne, By me Princes Prov. 8. 15. rule, and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Dan. 2. 21. power is given from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, Thou couldest haue Iohn 19. 11. no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the world hath beene governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which government the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Again, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

What other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplyed before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall flood: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannic in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Giants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Government of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers, shall thou make thee Deut. 16. 18. in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Government is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; as, to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniust ruling of the confused multitude, seditionously swaying the State: contrary to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholofanus; genuis. paucorum, & malorum, of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Man-kinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gave Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Houholds (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greeke ὄικος, which signifieth a House, or of the word Via because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke παῖς, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (hauing their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Screame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impetrie began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioine and sit together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida: either ab opponendo se hostibus, because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus because thicker they gathered their riches for sistance and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab urbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Ciuis, and that, ab eo quod multis udo ciuibus commingit together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also knowne. For every Citizen is also a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken of Magistro, from a Maister, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος): and so the Greekes call them Μεγιστανες, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expretheth both the cause efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that who soeuer resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not only be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistrate. Christ commanded that all due to Cesar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Idolaters (even those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of

of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Christostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King then no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo principe esse quam nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neg. enim libertas tutior vlla est (saith Claudian) quam Domino seruire bono: No libertie (saith he) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howeouer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wife man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Government, and Government, they so ioyned, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into seuerall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyet, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euery Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not only harden and shrinke the openest and most iuuall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our yonger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, wee praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grievous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make by Chush, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chush, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empirie of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Me- lanchton conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or seuerer Governour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo in- ligendus est Gigas ille. Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood, yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar; so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Is- chan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldaa about the Citie of Ury; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldaa, were no partners in the vnblesseing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Celestinus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Geropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Naucerus with others, make many Nimrods. Enstius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose, and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Abi autem Ninus regnabit post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos. There did Ninus reign after the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixtie five yeres. But it could not be vnkowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus's time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat: who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cesar ouerthrew the liberty of the Romane Commonwealt, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Peterinus is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one yere: the one dyed; the other in the same yere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie; then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assiria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain the reof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis's time.

—Dicitur aliam.

Cocilius muris cinxisse Semiramis Vrbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue bene giuen to many other Kings aswell. For if we may beleue Iustine, then were Vexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanis of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue inuaded & mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; & both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That euer Nimrod inuaded any of these Cities, but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archad, and Epiphanius, Arphal, Iunius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Assacene for Assacene. Others vndervnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accad to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Achad; and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Augustine, Orech; and Paginius, Erec this place Iunius vnderstands for Araccae in Susiana; but there is also a Citie in Comagene called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine prooffe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinis: of which Am. Marcellinus, Saint Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Hieronymus for Ctesiphon: others doe think it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But Le Moine be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh in the Land of Shinar: (as in this Valley of Shinar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them). And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Cities farre removed, and in seuerall Prouinces: did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalneh from Babylon, saying: Go ye now (saith Amos) to Chalneh, and from thence go ye to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistines. The Geneua translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities one of Shinar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo; which was built long after, not farre from the place where Sad Memphis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalneh is situate in the Valley of Shinar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur for the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controversy sic weanfully disputed without any direct prooffe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confesse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erut enim principum regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaris: & terra ha processit in Assyriam ubi edificauit Ninus: (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the land of Shinar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses' time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answere the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth: vnto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceeds and setteth downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Tanai and his sonnes: for of the rest rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbrell the sonnes of Ham, of which Chus was the eldest: and then the sons of Chus and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan, leauing Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the Storie of the Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had bene against order; neither would Moses haue past ouer so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chus, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh hee maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israhel. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conceiue that P. Commestor in his historia Scholastica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug praeui Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be vnderstood of Assur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliacionem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tortilius: Tortilius Acad. Gen 10. 30 who saith he tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Osee 1. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Sem; and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Meitz in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Commestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which words of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, B. A. filij, Ninum considerant, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrary Caluin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; then which therein is no place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuersitie in the translation and vnderstanding; in so much as Michael de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to interrete, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather then Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldees, by Esay remembred: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrants that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Pharisees, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly waisted and destroyed: where by he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (inuincible, as themselves thought) should also soone after be ouer-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ece terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit. Assur fundauit eam, in capitulum traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Genes) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldearum, & hac desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: *If thou goe over to Chitim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt have no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Paganus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chaldæm, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not, once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruined it. Iunius in the place of ships lets the word (pro Barbarijs) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Genes, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esey (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Chitim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief merchandise came in by the Citie Vr, or Vrchos in Chaldaa, wherethe body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otrix, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the east banks of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandise by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Tercodon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchos: and then by Babylon, and thence by Ruer and ouer Land they conveyed it into Syria, and to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldaa, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopp'd vp. Eius cursum vetustas aboluit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen assium: Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esey here note for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecateus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchos: and by the Greekes, Chaldaopolis, The Citie of Chaldaa: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time, inhabited, And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldaa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Paganus conuerted (by ship) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued, because it was a Port Towne: and the Ruer so farre vp, as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldaa is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth desert Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Bureans) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, *Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esey, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comestier and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Assur is in this place diuerly taken (as for the sonne of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to proue that the same Assur built Ninine, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue or Image to be honored as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Ninine, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Ninine (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsiō thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Ninine: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit insauare; Sbe might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Ruer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee wanted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

Dan. 4. 17.

§. III.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BEFORE we returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transmigration; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembred, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, & in Assyria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninine, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his traualles were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninine, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increafe of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whole time (saith Esey) all these Nations were called Meropes, a meronis linguarum terræ diuisio, 50 me; by reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after hee had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabauius King of Armenia, and those parts of scythia which Berossus calls Scythia Sages, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

That we are not to marvaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

Had so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimus is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberal and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Enterprizes many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisdome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they eyther want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the diuision of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they posselt, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceiued, that when the Earth was first diuided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & vnder-tooke to inhabite all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimus time, would not have beene posselt in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neyther did those that were sent, and trauelled far off (order being the true parent of prosperous successe) vndertake so difficult enterprizes without a Conducter or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolu'd all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrat, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enioy the harvest of their owne Trauails: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatnesse, eyther posselt the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vndertakings and Conquests of Nimus (the son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Soueraignie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayed themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatium King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatium I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reuercius all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Nimus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names asfine vnto it.

Hence this second King and Succesour of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (as addition) giuen by Nimus, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrillus against Iulian calls the Father of Nimus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Nimus and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinity) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belpheub, and Belphephen. Those that are learned in the Hebræe and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princes, milites, Chieftes in the Warres, though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honoris explanationis arcanarum rerum, in honorem sibi expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to haue the same signification: Hieron. Of. c. 4. and sayeth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Nimus in the more of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which, that he might add the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Irenæus) came Idolatry, and the first vse of Images into the World. Irenæus doth interpret Bel by Petrus, old orancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne, so in the Punick or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycis makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Arabians worshipped (By them erected on the Mountain Phogor, or Pter, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Beelzebub; the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel, foundeth (God) and Schub (Flies or Hornets;) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Demils. But the Prophet Osee teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe; And at that day (saith the Lord) shall I call me Ithi, and shall call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Babal, be iustly to be set towards God; yet it respecteth that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, as Irenæus says in his particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) Belphegor, and Belphephen, Belphegor is expounded out of Facius, D. Minus (speculat. in Iudicia: The Lord of the Watch Tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place where in it was worshipped. It is also written Belpheor, or Belpheor, and Pter (the y-day) as much as Deuout; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni dictum familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui verbes considerant, sancti, et primogeniti eorum Ioues et Iunones. Hercules vero nepotes eorum sanctissimi: et the ancient of of Noble Families and Kings, which founded Cities, are called Saturni, et Ioues, et Iunones, et Iunones, their valiant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith E. P. Virens) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Nimus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter-Babylonius: whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Am. Diad. l. 1. antiquæ) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter-Belus, who was Father to Agapetus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Coloniæ to the River of Egypte, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But we here say; Belus the Iohn of Babylonians and Iste, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telecamp, who after the death of Apis married Iste: (Cædope then reigning in Aethiopia) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images began from Belus in Babel.

For the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentour of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might be borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Ambrosius affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus: Over the River (saith he) there are Gardens, where they bury the bones of Belus his Tomb, which Hercules brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of bricks, as high as high, and on every side it had a long in breadth. It appears by Cyril against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet living.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vn superbus (by arrogant, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: perseverant igitur Assyri, & finitima illi gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deities (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thur as, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thur as reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Iapheth slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiueth; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt. Et pro vniuersisq; vite meritis vel magnificentia, colunt apud suos post mortem ceperunt: sed (Demoniis persuadentibus) quos ille pro sua memoria honoauerunt, minores Deos existimauerunt: adfuerunt magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum fymenta. They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans asserued to be gods: and euery one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Deuils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie: Gentilitas (saith he) inuentrix est Idolorum. in 2^o capit. caput est imaginum; Gentilitas in the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose; Gentiles lignum adorant, sicut etiam imaginem Dei. The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantium. Et veretur 30 (saith Lactantius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen thift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Douglas and Hyperdouglas, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen Image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remoue, weed it, or by feare, or by any perswasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selues, and make you a grauen Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt not make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisdom, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of vborredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil: Nidali quum in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscriptis eum mente sua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde so. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and mindes, how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Penill of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and spread this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170. yeeeres, observing the Law of Numa: who thought it impietie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterward preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Grecians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth: Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicam, genu posito illa adoram, & cum hac suspiciam, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto with bended knees, those they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Seneca thus derideth in this sort scoffed at:

Hec miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religio a sibi sculptant simulachra, suum, Factorem fugiunt, & quae fecere venerantur. Quis furor est? quae tanta animos dementia ludit? Præuolucrum, turpem, bouem, cornuatum, Dracunculæ, Semi-hominem, canem supplex homo prouus adorat.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities, And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart, Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise, And feare the worke of their owne hands and art. What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile Mens mindes? that man should vgly shapcs adore, Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the vile Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant Rudiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inuighed against Images: and Hosian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the foules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Herodotus witnesseth, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statues of their Gods. Lycurgus neuer taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortal natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixth Booke de præparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Criminus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembered that witnesseth the disdaine which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hosian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis initis orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuam mentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ver ea discernit homines Deū inuisibile cognoscere: Images (say they, & so before the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no other wise esteemed them then pictures indeed, yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stones, and painted Canuaes (called the pictures of Christ, but Ladie, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderstanding: On these Blockes we call (saith the Booke of Wisdomes) when we passe through the raging flames, on these Blockes more vnto then the ship that carrieth vs.

This Heathen inuention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dei Consentes, sem maiorum gentium; selecti, Patritij, in signioris, diij mediij: Consellij, gods, or gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, selecti gods, Patritij, gods of marke, and common gods (which the Romans called Mediorum) diij infimi, and correltriall Heroes, and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Cinitate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable soules and rotten bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the vnknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lightneth euery man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeeres led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was forgot in generall, or that euery Nation had some one which rooke particular and singular care of them, as Lupiter in Crete, Isis in Agypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but euery Citie, and almost euery Family had a god a-part. For as it is written in the second of Kings: the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Asbima, and the Amis made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sepheruims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esaie derided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme them selves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god, an Idoll, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath but their eyes from sight, and their heart from vnderstanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to beleue the Commandements of God to direct against Idolatrie, to beleue the Prophets, and to beleue S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from Idolatrie, I speake as vnto them which haue vnderstanding, iudge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

Vnto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatrie, the first that inuiously invaded his Neighbor Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publike. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose storie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Amnius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Christians knoweth) to the vnderstanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassus, and others: yet Lodouicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the same Belus the Athenians erected, saith Plinius. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian & Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Asctades, and to the times of Isaia. For of Metaethenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Menemon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vppwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the storie of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approoveth him in some things, and Athenius, Paulus, and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoeuer his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. S. Augustine affirms that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Atricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie, because he commanded many people, and was his Kinsman, a Chusite, and the neercst Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because hee inuaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Atricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himselfe that way toward the East; but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleue, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whome it is sayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seuen Children, though others affirme that hee all died in one battaile against him. Whether he inuaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, hee returned, and set the worke of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. fixe hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus preuailing, and Zoroaster being slain, hee entred further into the Countrie, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrian (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and posselt. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and externall beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) hee tooke her from her husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out if hee refused to consent. Hee therefore yielding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincenius supposeth to be Cham the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probabilitye. For Cham was the Paternall Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincenius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuiled by some wicked Knaue, & so intitled: of which Sextus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie, which Art (saith he) with the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: seuen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Flood; and 7. of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuiled discourse, which went vnder title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like unto this of Comestor. These be Cassian's words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitiois istis & sacrilegiis suis aris infectus, sciens, nullum se posse super his memorialium librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cumpatre suo, &c. Cham (the name of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memorial of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remayne with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard Stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weepe, which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, to faith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Floriscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minneralls, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldaea also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that their knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sonnes. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned heere then any other in that age, if hee exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdome of after-times in this, that hee knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life, and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which be longed to that wisdome, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starrs, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had beene inuented by Zoroaster, hee could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kinde of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse tangling about the word and arte of Magick. Arnobius remembereth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster or Zorastres was giuen: which by Hermodorus & Dionysius seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of arte, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphilus, who liued in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hofianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threecore and eighene yeres. Suidas remembereth a fifth, called Persedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the sonne of Oromasdes; which Picinus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Lactantius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and Stenchiuss, make him a Chaldean. But by those bookes of one Zoroaster, found by Picinus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation; though the word (Chaldean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrus makes the Chaldei and Magi diuers; Picinus the same, But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picinus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those bookes of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, hee saith, be intituled, Patri Ezre Zoroastri, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre ainers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

Now for Magick it selfe; which Ante (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi Pic. Mir. fo. 81. reprehendunt; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend; Et sic ut Canes ignoscos semper allatrant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: so they censure and hate shethings they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse leaving Ninus for a while, to speake somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus: who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vsurped that title. For Magick, Coniuring, and witcherie, are farre differing Arts, wherof Plinie being ignorant scotteth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdome by his grace, found the arte after long studie and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitiue, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuerant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Arte of Magick is the Arte of worshipping God. To which effect Apolonius in his Epistles expounding the word (saith) that the Persians called their gods magos: whence hee addeth that Magus is either ignarus dei or deprecorum deum (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Math. 23. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kinde: which Piccolomini calleth diuine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wise men: For, the feare and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wise men the Greekes call Philosophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they somewhat neerely retaine to this day, calling their Priests Brachmans; among the Aegyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofianes, one of the ancient Magicians) vtieth these words: Et uerum Deum merita maiestatis prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei sed ueritatem uenerationis non ita seire. Idem dæmonas prodit terrenis, uagos, humanitatis inimicos; solitones (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hofianes) ascribeth the due maiestie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath deliuered that there are Demis earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

Eli Maiestie also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenly sciences; but vniuallly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuine. And it is also right which Eli Maiestie auoweth, that under the name of Magick altogether vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth Eli Maiestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which Eli Maiestie commendeth: is of that kinde whereof the Deuill is a parjare: Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kinds of those wise men: Ariels, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Ariels the olde Latine translation calleth Sophistas; Patebimus and Paganus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the more of Patebimus) Naturphilosophi; Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) diuinorum humanarumq. rerum scientiam proficentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke and the Emulic call them Inchantes, Incantus, Magicians; Cassiodorus, Coniecturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonie, The Wise men of Babel.

The second sort Malefici, Paganus, Iunius, and our Englishe call Astrologers, Hierome in the Septuaginta, Magicians. The third kinde are Malefici, or Venefici, in Hierome, Paganus, and the Septuaginta, Witches, or Possones in Iunius, Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in Englishe. That Witches are also rightly to be termed Venefici, or Possones; and that indeede there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Arte of Magick or Necromancie yet the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maieſtie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaans: who took vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euent: and thus they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magike, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfet the highest and most noblest part of it, yet fo as they haue also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magike was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Iudeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magike or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Io. Damasceus) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that hee instructed the Egyptians in Aritmetike and Astronomie, who before Abrahams coming vnto them knew none of these sciences.¹⁰

And fo doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Gurſian: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium praestantissimus Chaldaus primum, deinde Phoenices, deum Aegyptios sacer dotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon asserunt, quod Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaans, then the Phoenicians; lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magike containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabbings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inward verities, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bofome to humane vie, Virritas in centro centri lites; Virtutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Alextus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyanaus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Theſſian; among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Budda; the Thracians had Zamolxis; the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abraham; and the Italians, Petrus Aponensis. The Magike which these men profess is thus defined: Magia est connexio a viro sapiente agentium per naturam compatientibus sibi congruentem respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magike is the connexion of naturall agents and patients; answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects; as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleeueth of the Trinity, which he could not inuestigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approoveth the immortallitie of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Loue, discoursing of the Absintie and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Pellus, Fictus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phoenicians, vnto Zoroaster owne words: Hac ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primum incorruptibilem, sempiternum, ingenium, expertum partium, sibipſis similitudinem, bonorum omnium origo, minorum non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus pater suus, sine doctrina iustitiam per doctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacre nature vicicus inuentor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word: God the first incorruptible, everlasting, vndergoen, without part; most like him selfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wisest by nature, the only true enter therof.

Sextus Senensis speaking of the wilddome of the Chaldaans, doth distinguish those who men into five orders, (to wit) Chaldei, or Chaldaans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartanim, (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Mechaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Wizards; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diuiners.

Chaldei were those which had the name of Chaldaans, which were Astronomers: Hygolum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinarum quam humanarum rerum causis philosophati sunt; who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartanim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustin) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdome of the Magi, which hee received from his Ancesters.

Mechaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Maieſties booke of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailles of beasts flaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertayned; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peuce truly obserueth, Præerat religioni Persæ, ut in populo Dei Leuitæ, studijq; vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Mægorum disciplinam scientiamq; perciperet: The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sextus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magike, his owne words are these: Et ne quem moueat præmissa Polychronij & Theophilij testimo-

*nia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam, alteram vbiq; ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fraudem cum demonibus mixta aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ id præstare naturalis philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutui naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; The testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vnderstood that Magike is of two sorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by couenants made with Devils; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practice part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutual application of naturall virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.*

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries vpon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kinds of wise Men formerly remembered, hee vseth this distinction: Quos nos hariclos, ceteris uero (id est) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui uerbum rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine utuntur & uitiis, & sapientia corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldeis Genethliacos significari puto, quos uulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quosq; & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Saluatoris ipsi primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & uenientes sanctam Bethleem adorauerunt puerum, stellæ desuper ostendente. They whom wee call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seeme to mee (such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that vse blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldaans I take them to bee signified by the name of Coniectors vpon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldaans: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativitee of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethleem did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers ascribe, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex federe factio vitu diabolici opera ad rem quancumque. That he is called a Magician now, adates, who having entered league with the Diuell, vseth his helpe to any master: yet (as our Saviour said of Diuice) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which vndergoe that title, were invented by the fallhood, subtilty, & enuy of the Deuill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per malā fidem. By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitlie to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecaphsim, yet had they no other reason then common custome therein. Consecratio autem communis Magos pro maleficiis accipit; Common custome (saith Hieronim. Da-S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauis

Per. Mar. Loc.

prim. fol. 173.

Magi nomen formidolosum, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficium, sed sapientem sonas & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ficinus) why dothest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospell, which doth not signifie a witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie & profession, but onely idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? *Causa fuit mirificientia quorundam operum, quae re vera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratio demonum naturae ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscientium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus haec. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant: The marvellousnesse of some works, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these works haue bene done by procurement of Devils, toyning the naturas together or mingling them, or housecouer fitting the naturas to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magick, which men call very improperly Necromantie.*

Col. Paric. de Leges p. 14.

Fol. 80.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith hee) the vntimely actiuitie of naturall agents we are asisted to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignoratis terminis potentia & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The limits or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether these verie workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall means: after which hee goeth on in this sort: Ideo non haereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verisimè & Catholice per ralem Magiam adiuuari nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholickely, that by such Magicks we are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously obiekt, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not about Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeeres fuller of knowledge then any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vntimost of Nature workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here, as in other kindes hath sought to obtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

Being therefore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then, Diuinorum cultor & interpret: A studious obseruer & expounder of diuine things; and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio; Then the absolute perfection of naturall Philosophy: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forth with wife and learned men, promissè and without difference & distinction, to confound lawfull & praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (coule S. Pauls words) with these beggerly rudiments, which the Diuell hath thrust in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magicks, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Diuell (who knoweth more then any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Diuell also in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Diuell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the Ministers and Seruants of God, changing him selfe for that purpose into an Angell of Light. Hee hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophers among those of the true God; hee hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting saith, in Chir. obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly bodies (as euery general experience sheweth) haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Againe, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beaurie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen all their proper names, which (that they not influence and vertues different) needed not: Recounteth the number of the Starres, and cal. fol. 167. lath them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Diuell ceaseth not to thrust in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleeeue in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wife and the simple obserue when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and flye into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth: that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bathing of Ducks forebode raine: for they feeble the Ayre moistened in their Quills. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Starke in the Ca. 2. ver. 7. ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to obserue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrailles for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable providence in the Liuers and bowels of birds and beasts. Againe, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames, not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Admetech to restore Sara to Abraham; because hee admonished Ioseph, and by Dreame Gen. 12. 17. informed Isaac, Laban, Pharao, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Iob: In Dreames and Visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon Iob 23. 17. men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the Diuell also practise his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Parisenfis) diuinitas imitatioes, his mocke-diuitie. This in the end grew so common, as G. Parisenfis diuides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, because all dreames (without distinction of causes) were drawne to Diuination, forbad the same by a Law, as by Cotus de ma- the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandis) it may scit & Marti- appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contented, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grievous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of a Polemonis poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Angustine re- Ang. de cura porteth of a Adrianos, whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already pro mortuo A- paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that that of Abyges of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, so far as the cause is not in our felues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

Deut. 32. 17
Leuit. 24.

But it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly vied were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himselfe commanded to be slaine. To this, divers answers may be given. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldeans, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the King, which himselfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with fleſh; and herein they confessed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be coniectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were meetly Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and proficiencies were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himselfe had beene taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Incanters: of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magior Wife-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vniust. For howsoeuer those men might deserue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustification of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture euery where of good with euill, of falshood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in euery kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient, worshipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Eldesters, that therefore bare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemosh, Iupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Expo. de Arte
pau. de Polybi.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) for observing the motions and natures of heauenly bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other vmoſt vertues, sometimes taught by the Diuell, and applied by his Ministers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illusions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth such men as are fallen from God, make other men reiect the obseruations of Dreames; so farre as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vse of them.

Deut. 18. 20.

Lastly, the prohibition to make flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Raine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if wee confound Arts with

with the abuse of them, we shall not onely condemne all honest Trades and enterchange among men (for there are that deueine in all professions) but we shall in a short time buy in forgetfulnesse all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obſcure and couer it ouer with a most scornfull and beggerly ignorance: and (as Plinius teacheth) we should reue our felues ingratos erga eos, qui labore carag, lucem nobis aperuerunt in tenebras: For without fail we should beue our felues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered what is light in this light.

Indeed not onely these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant, but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort: In speculo Mathematico verum illud quod in ammisit, quia: Cusan. Comp. Theolog. c. 1. car, placet, non modo remota similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate: In the Glasse of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in euery kinde of knowledge, not in an obſcure image, but in a neere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kinds of splanfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if wee may so call them, which are couered with the name of Magick: and esteemed abusiuely to be as branches of that Tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancie or Goetia: and of this againe there are diuers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortal soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing else but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of rayeing vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble, that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Moule) they therein (as they suppose) inſconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtlesse, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodnesse, no, not by the fearefull Word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himselfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet reſolue himselfe, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Diuels seeme to vse, is but thereby to possesse themselves of the bodies and soules of those which saile them vp; as Hu Maestrie in his Booke aforesaid hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is onely secundum quid, scilicet: ex pacto, respectu, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can doe vpon those simple and ignorant Diuels, which imbrace Ambitious imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come, vncalled, and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassals, doe no way seeke any such enforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale together with Cardian mortall Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Asurnathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kinde of Diuels liued not aboue a thousand yeeres: which Plinius in his Treatise de Crucibus confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true, that Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, call him headlong out of his clauies, when he was sure he should perill with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where saureth) yet the same practice at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodorus, who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue bene) had the same mortall fall that he had. The like success had Andas, a principall pillar of the Manichian Heresie, as Crisostom in his Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth: and for a manifest proofe hereof we see it euery every day, that the Diuell leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places farre distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transpositions (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maisie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie hath confirmed by vniuersall reasons, that they are acerely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Cristals: of whom Cusanus: Patui sunt incubatores, qui in uigile & vitro volumus spiritum includere: whom Spiritus non claudunt corpore: They are foolish Incubators which will shut up their spirits within their nailes or in Glasse: for a spirit cannot be included by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator: so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the Diuell hath corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general, yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract figures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan: For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Atmotechnia, and the like.

The last (and indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no less enuious and cruel, reuengefull and bloody, then the Diuell himselfe. And these accursed creatures having sold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes, either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of personning. The difference betwene Necromancers and witches, His Maisie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a fort) command, the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of petite Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle liued on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to beadmired then Mahomet Doue, which he had vsed to feed with wheare out of his care: which Doue, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet shoulder and thrust his Bill therein to find his breake-fast. Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabs; that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him advice. And certainly if Beasts had liued in elder times, hee would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could neuer master or instruct any Beast as he did this Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by incantations (which the Mahians a people of Indie practised: Colubros disrumpit Manica cantu: Enchanting Mania makes the Snakes to burst.) That is hath beene vsed it appears, Psalm 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde; and euen by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magicke or Incantment, then to draw out a Mouſe with a peece of rosted Cheefe.

§. VII.

Of diuerſe wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

Verie the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion then hee hath (not to speake of his ability, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance, as when Egypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels; he otherwise worke but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their ownereation disſuading them from daring ouermuch, or indeede (and that which is the onely certaine cause) the great mealy of the Creator, Teneos eos ligatos (saith the same Author) velut inmaniſſimas bel-luas. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogs which Pharaos Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Aurum obstruct, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were; which might argue that they were not creatures indeede. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Wec sancti Demones natari creati, sed qua a Deo creati sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason: Demones quibusdam nebulis implet omnes mentis intelligentie, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet (that is) The Diuell fills with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Diuell entereth in, beginning with the fantastic, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantastic is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogs were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per actum cum positiui, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that 30 Saint Augustine beleueed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis he vnder these words: De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, alio-ſed. 67. rum, animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum addidit adu-ſus, quia ipsa semina natura confortant & acunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus nature videatur (qua tardius talia efficeret consuevit) sed potentia Demonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogs, and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh, but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the very most of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect theyre, as well as moue it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that hee sometimes doth it: but how? 50 In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he fore-told the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancy of the world to this day, and obserued the successe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: hee that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, then those that inhabit the earth: if hee should not sometimes, yea if hee should not very oftentimes guesse rightly of things to come (where God pleaseeth not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned men doe oftentimes oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Diuell doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, hee euermore answereth by Riddles, as Cresus Halympe penetrans magnam subuerit opum vim,

If Cresus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdomes hee shall ouerthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the ouerthrow of his owne Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Diuell may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely; as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew vs at all times and certainly what is to come. Qui, Parisiensis: Solus enim diuina intelligentia ac sapientia est, occulta nosse & reuelare: It is onely proper to delectis. c. 14. Gods understanding and wisdom, to know and reueale hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the Diuell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Diuell hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Diuels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Iustine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; but afterwards hee changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anime piorum a corpore separatae, impiorum autem penas launt, donec istarum ad vitam eternam, illarum vero ad eternam mortem que secunda dicitur corpora reuincantur; The soules of the goodly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the iust rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And besides S. Augustine Iustine Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleueed firmly, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyriil quum a corporibus sanctorum anima abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitatis diuina commendari; we must beleuee when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Diuell cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Abister no nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Finum (saith Augustine) in igne aeterno; alterum in regno aeterno; The one in eternall fire; the other in Gods eternall Kingdom. And though it be written in Iane Pontificis, that many there are who beleuee that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt, & male quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They beleuee, and they beleuee amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath bene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hec oratio a fraude atq. deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Diuell, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Abster ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, medium Prophetae, a demonio credamus extraxim; God forbid that we should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet should be drawne up againe by a Diuell.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the wooden images Cherubims; and false-brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus a booke not numbered among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, it is hee his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, (confesseth) yet Siracides following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Diuell would willingly per-swade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power, yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrarie to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (or whosoever wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by dreames, by Vision, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceiue, that he would permit the Diuell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his owne diuine Law to ask counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Diuell, and not the soule of a dead body, that gaue answer and aduice.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the dead by the power of God; those Diuels which S. Augustine calleth ludificatores animantium sibi subiectorum, Mockers of their owne vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voyces of men, doe also perfwade their gracelesse and accursed attendants: that themselves both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. E-ludit Diabolus aciem tuam spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Viues; The Diuell beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Diuels power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinned. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntarie vassall: Potest ad malum imitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine, he can allure, but he cannot enforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwise, may goe into the number remembered by Lucretius:

In tenebris metuant: sic nos in luce timemus.*

We feare by light, as children in the darke.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife
Semiramis: and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Ninine by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

But to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninine: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertaine. As for the Citie it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and also confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and vnfeareable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the wals whereof were an hundred foot vpright, and had such a breadth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these wals were garnished with 1500. Towres which gaue exceeding beautie to the rest, and strength no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this Citie (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these workes of Babylon and Ninine begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninine, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceede her husband by farre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselves and their people, without either Wals or Towres; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Bryars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth : and putposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beautie and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus : and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

His she did after the death of her husband Ninus : who after he had mastered Babylonia, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninus, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute soveraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenians, and others, speaks of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, then that it had any truth.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire : of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because hee changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Nimue in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest herselfe, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented herselfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as the ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnder taken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him ; yet it is very vnlike that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtiltie : (for so long she reigned after the death of her husband :) but it may be true that Ninus or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernment and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countie, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascaloni.⁴⁰ as ; of Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derceta or Derecia, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had professed a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreme punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake : in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow ; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beautie & humane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body:

into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground : and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place. Kabbala, Paganus, and Iunius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared : the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Trium, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Nephtane. For this Citie being maritime (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phoenicia) vsed all their deuotion to Nephtane, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after disfigurement : with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

BV for her Pedigree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Heralds : and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazzard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres she made with glorious successe : all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she neuer returned: and that of all her most powerful Armie thete furnished but onely twentie persons : the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famie, or slaine by the sword of Staubates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbred : so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which she leued by her Lieutenant Dercetaus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions ; of Horse-men one million ; of Chariots armed with hookes on each side, one hundred thousand ; of those which fought vpon Camels as many ; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand, of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand ; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers : which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phoenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports : so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certaintie, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards : whose Armie (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the beliefe of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Provinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted : the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staubates vpon the banks of Indus, Santicum Antanis extreme : (she sang her Last song ; and (as Antiquitie hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus), whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Dove in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis : and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inuironed with a wall carryed fouresquare of great height and beautie, hauing on each square certaine Brazen Gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square there raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile ; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a leffe circuit) shee set a second Towre ; and so eight in all, one about another : vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests Priests made the obseruation of the starres, because this Towre ouer-topped the ordinarie cloudes.

By beholding the ruines of this Towre haue many Trauellers beene deceiued; who suppose that they haue seene a part of Nimrod's Towre, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every yeere (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem; and of the Temple of Salomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redeliuered. This Temple Xerxes enueined with the foile; which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldaans. I denie not that it might haue bene in his desire to so doe; but he enioyed but a few yeere after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and giuen to the same superstition of the Starres that the Chaldaans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were compasse round, and saigantibus, saith Plinie. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull obseruer of rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) made this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a se sommer de tirer une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the ayre as farre as he can, with great difficultie shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brieft transition to the question about the time of the birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus, Annius bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the ouerthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diadorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approued writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of warre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiect to ease and delicacie, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other then that out of iealousie hee euery yeere changed his Prouinciall Governors, and built Colleges for the Chaldaean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that hee reduced againe the Bactrians and Cassians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, inuented iewels of gold and stone, and some engins for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meet these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Ninias, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balamus. For otherwise if we seek to proue things certaine by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures set vs downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story at aduenture, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Misrum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare, No miruaine if when in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings reigned, as also for other good causes we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeere the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth-yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby see all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres betweene Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abrahams birth was in the yeere after the flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, they yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: feeling to be learned in many errors; or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuerty.

§. II.

As proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

THose which seek to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beza, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lye, that Terah at 70. yeeres begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worst liked, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the twentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah his age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. yeeres: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and is, after his Fathers death.

ANswere all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of my mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams iourney into Canaan be first considered; of before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his traualles, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when hee was called) obeyed God, so that hee went out into a place which he should afterward receiue for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whether he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where he now dwelt, &c. that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan, one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleued in the rest. But that he performed the commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Fr and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause then euery man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was beseged with famine at his first arrival, and driuen to flee into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuers of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermion or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Fr to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancie; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe, that hee had not animum reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare coniecture, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the Land of Canaan, &c. to the Land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could haue benee thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vntried, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his Father benee then alieue, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them; that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were urged: could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not our trouble some. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres olde, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee left quite vndone the businesse, which as we read, was within foure or five yeeres after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his only care? Did not hee binde with a verie solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither hee nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, 10 that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had bene there in person so litle, as within foure or five yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his own iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only sonne, who was then five and thirtie yeeres old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children: rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleued) that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuise. What might be the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his matters prosperitie, telling it as 20 newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately bene among them, would not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardlie answerable: considering how auerfe hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kined could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his owne lineage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whole blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember Lots Wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: we shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posteritie of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperitie; but the prophetic which thereupon hee heard by Elias, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they sate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that 30 Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamitie vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: that he neuer returned, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for thereto, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleuee as they doe. For all the traualles of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camersin in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem 40

he removed to a mountaine betwene Belhel and Hale: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more, then could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumaea, vnder Abimelec: and after nere vnto it at Berfabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in anie one storie, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason be therewithall beleued, that hee would in those his first traualles haue provided himselfe 10 of some certaine seate, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabite, hee departed thence to Belhel and Hale: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some 20 habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, Hee went forth, going and iourning towards the South: and alwaies vnsted. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebrei. Further, to proue that hee had not formerly bene in the Countrey, we may note, 30 that ere hee came vnto Belhel and Hale, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seede will I geue this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without anie other prouident care for himselfe, beleued in the Word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being assured, hee receiued a second promise from God, that he would giue those Countreys vnto him and his seede to inhabite and inherite.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted anie such double iourney of Abrahams, seeing hee setteth downe all his passages else, where, long and short: as when hee moued from Sichem, and seated betwene Hale and Belhel: 30 the distance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre; being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and sate downe at Gerar, being lesse then sixe miles; No, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuitie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betwene the Creation & the Flood in sixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham fourtene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fife and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeeres. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauels, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remooues of fife miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue 40 ministred some varietie of matter, or accident, worthie the inscribing and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtie yeere.

Now touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vnlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. 50 This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respected onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe, Sarah thy wife shall haue a sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to bee with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sonnes after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Ischban, Medan, Midian, Shobak, and Sbnub: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: and the yongest youngest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres olde should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed depaire of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed, and Iesse, who lived so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seven yeeres after.

§. V.

The answers to two more of the objections: (showing that wee may have certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

It followeth now to speake something to the objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made uncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, unless we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205, which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can bee no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jachs great grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nachor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nachor: It was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their naturall Countrey, and Cite of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldea: but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kinsmen: he himselfe having also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleued in the God of Abraham, it canno way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this servant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the wil of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written, Take, goe that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Iehouah hath said. This their offering of

of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some latter writers, as Caictan, Olester, Ascalus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleued in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called Abrahams servant, blessed of I E H O V A H, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, I sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prooue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons: proving that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

SO the maine objection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life:

20 grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooue at all that he was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Ioseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Iesse; nor Salomon of David: as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordinibus, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham. The order of nati-

Aut. quod su-

uitie is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so it is here, where it is said, that Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enosh Kenan at 90; Kenan Mahalaheel at 70; Mahalaheel Jered at 60; Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentia, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is most commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in those of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, qua committitur scilicet pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Sem in liberis Noa, & Abraham in liberis Thare. Pietate, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedence to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entered Canaan in the 75. yere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. yeeres. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had continued 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham roset, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if

Terah

Gen. 14.

Terah begat Abraham at 70. yere old, then must Abraham haue bene 135. yeeres when he first set his foote in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205. the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75: he rescued Lot at 83: he had Isaac at 86: he had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had bene 35. yeeres olde, and Isaac, 49. both which must then haue bene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: vntlesse we should either denie credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his fathers death: or else belieue the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word, πρὸ, may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue bene borne in the fenty yere of Terah, we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authoritie will warrant: For Abraham had no children in yr of Chaldea, nor in Haran: nor in tenne yeeres after his arrivall into Canaan. For the yere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yere of the World 2083. and the yere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yere 2094: which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Betsale, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot bee that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse then tenne yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yere of Terahs age.

Gen. 12.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75: if Terah had begotten him at 70, then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue been the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeeres: and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham: for Sarah or Isch was tenne yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres olde.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at nine yeeres olde: for granting that Haran was borne but one yere after Abraham, and Sarah withinten yeeres as olde as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had liued but nine yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isch was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of principallitie. Again, to what end was the word Isch or Ischab inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For to speake of any thing superfluous it is not vsed in Gods Bookes: and if Isch had not belonged to the storie, it had bene but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had bene true (as those of the contrarie opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nabor and Lot, Sarah, and Milchab, who were notwithstanding the parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Isch in this place, were shee not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an olde man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milchab, Abraham marrying one of Harans daughters, and Nabor the other, Sarah also being withinten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to every reasonable man (not obtinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left yr in Chaldea. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeeres younger than Abraham himselfe. Lyra his words are these: Significat Haran fuisse iunior ipso Abraham, Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo. And afterward, Et idcirco melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit vltimo natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primus, propter eius dignitatem: Et quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: Et quia primus facti cū ei reponmissio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger then Abraham himselfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah: And therefore is somewhat better to be said, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of Thare, notwithstanding he is named first for his dignitie, both because hee was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made vnto him, as before it is said of Sem.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

Therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yere. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeeres old; these two numbers added make 205. yeeres, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For myselfe, I haue no other end herein then to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story: I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his sixteenth Booke de Ciuitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himselfe in his five and twentieth question vpon Gen. But Saint Augustine herein followed Iosephus and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augustine. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Iosephus sought to inke Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Capitaines, of which every one had an infinite multitude vnder him; trecentos & octodecem praefectos habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo precebat. And that Pharaoh inuading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to be beleeued, but with discrete reuerations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Flood to Abraham, is vspheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossly haue they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom finde their opinion rehearsed without the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vsuall among them, to maintaine whatsoever they haue bene formerly knowne to hold and beleue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to haue bene borne in the 130. yere of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authors, as Baeholcerus, Chiraeus, Functius and others, are very averse heerein, especially Iosephus Scaliger with his Salm Caluinus, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poysonous. Contrariwise, Augustinus Tornilius a Priest of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I haue already deliuered: not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps vawilling to owe thanks to heretikes. For my selfe I doe neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly, those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; Nor fauour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approved it, but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Dinine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forpast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeres, or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham; or this other account, which makes 352. yeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to bee the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being sariated doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; we shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeres betweene the Flood and Abrahams birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeres giuen. For if wee aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouerdeeply betweene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance blede thereby, were not the testimonies of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wherefoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruales? giuing also strength thereby to common cauillers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

An. m. d. c. l. x. i. 1708
An. d. c. l. x. i. 1708
An. d. c. l. x. i. 1708
An. d. c. l. x. i. 1708

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeres were consumed: and taking the Assyrian History with vs, the same number of yeres were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeres to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Saba, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeres more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeres to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparifon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arrived in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeres remaining) we may giue them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceiued, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwaies the 10 mountains sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approueth: which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 154. yeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 154. we celsitie bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-flout. For Nimrod, by this accomplished in all but one hundred fcecuty nine yeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred three yeres: and of the same age of the 20 World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne,

Ninus reigned 9. yeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaureth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. yeres, and died in the 52. yeere complet of Abrahams life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeres, in the second yeere of 761. of the World.

wherefoe Abraham left Mesopotamia. Ninus reigned 9. yeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaureth Semiramis his Successor.

When Abraham was 85. yeres olde, hee rescued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surpris Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeres, and Abraham 30 came into Canaan but 23. yeres after Semiramis dieth: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue beene this Ninias the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeres as aforesaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, is most certaine; vnlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and 40 Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew: Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of 50 Ninus Zameis the king of the Assyrians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who inuaded Tracemitis or Basan, and ouerthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successour of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Momark: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, *Twelve yeeres were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprize, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomara, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels;) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) receiued a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betwene India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.*

§. X.

Of Atioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue bene King, lies betwene Cœlesyria and Arabia Petrea.

NOW the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellasar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Peterius fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petrea, or into Idumæa, which Countreies these foure King chiefly inuaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vsed all the Art they had to inuite Crasus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprize what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Bithsa King of Gomorra, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zeboin, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning, of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countreies, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, be imagined to haue bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countreies: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar, and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrie by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaine of Seir: inclosed by the diuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two smal Prouinces of Troanitis or Basan, and the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnusuall, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellasar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as is saie fetched to ioyn with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellasar at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellasar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Peterius himselfe remembereth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbiibus a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cœlesyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be located by Stephanus in Cœlesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arims was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenants of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch Confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betweene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arims, Arioch, Aretas, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Prouince called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch heere spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arims, the Confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that sidetowards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chalæa: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

HE fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gajim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Peterius out of Sirabo, findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant: Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Sirabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Sirabo is nothing in this question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Sirabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many pettie kingdomes adioyning to Phœnicia, and palestina: as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Apamena, Chalcide, Calisto, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioynethemselues to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselues together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

Gen. 14. c.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

Assly, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Sarape, Viceroy, or Prouinciall gouernour of Babylon, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Petrius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldaea, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Chedorlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatneffe at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example: and experience teach vs, that those things which are let vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire did at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tambarlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grieved) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For in regno Babylonic hic parum respiciunt, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninus) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it isthat the neckes of mortall men hauing bene neuer before galled with the yoke of forraigne dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slauerie: no long descent hauing as yet inuaded the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: winnesse thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither inducured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what he could not without contentious perill enjoy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal, make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Fr in Chaldaea to Charan, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yere of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armie of foure millions, with her selfe vterly consumed in India and all her armies and engines of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arims the sonne of Ninus, or Amraphel, inuaded the Baetrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bene reuolted from Ninus, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recouered one part, so did Balens or Balanens, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes idest, Victor or triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vndertakings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninus, we may well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninus or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninus, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

The consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows, were Lords of those Regions, wherunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may beset for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may wee otherwise conceit of this Historie: remouing thereby so ne difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to finde, because they could not finde how to resolute them. For as it had bene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arioch was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being disioyned by so many great Nations of different languages, a wife man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elusarsame and that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants; what reason can wee finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorah? and when he should haue sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Media, and Zoroaster of Baetria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five puerile Townes, leauing Tyrrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had reuolted as forable; yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, then that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the river of Indus.

Gen. 14. 17.

Indus: Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should finde no great wisdome, if he knowing the weaknesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to counteruaile one months charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue beene, who with so mighty preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he leide the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this situation (supposed to great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings; of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Nimias, who lived foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same titles: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might comfort together, and make the weakest of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spaine, with almost as many kings as scuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusual, for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Nimias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vnder-taking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seek aduentures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streame of writers upon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Nimias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrapa of Shinar, vnder Nimias; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Ninieue: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an Vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countreies named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countreies themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, then King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing beene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or petty Kings. These and such like things here to vige, were but with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthy to haue cost bestowen vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countreies or people foure these foure were Kings, this expedition is the only publique action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esaue and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath bene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdome; it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brieft of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soone after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowne the fertilitye of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrey; in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdome one hundred ninie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewne in the Table following.

The Table and especially the Chronologie is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscuritie, manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not bene more vncertaine then the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscuritie in the Egyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted vnumstrangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent works and and royall buildings in Aegypt, such as are neuer found but in States that have greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of marueilous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Aegyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Aegyptians, and publishing in their owne name, such as pleased them best; haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Aegyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing scene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, maybe credited, as to an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Aegyptian Kings, runs thrice altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Aegyptian Dynasties, and otherwise it appears that Chams reigne in Aegypt began in the yeere after the Flood, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuerse, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Noah: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured foureteen yeeres: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue bene vnder the three younger Gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I do not therefore beleuee that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bene mentioned, because Anniius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as afore said: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. yeeres, which were betwene the Flood and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Aegypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anniius diluio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Genesis recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuerne one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Aegypt, we allow twenty yeeres: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Aegypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Aegypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seuerall times times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Aegypt haue bene peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercurius thinke) must haue bene before the Flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Aegypt, after the Flood, enough hath bene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations betwene Adam and the Flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witnesse. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie, as had bene vied in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conductor, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oftentimes many vnder one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall families of Kings, as the vaunting Aegyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitution of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooffe, That it was the manner of the Aegyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reserving the Soueraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Pisfer. This is confirmed, firstly, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Aegypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicel Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubaal: and Zebul his Officer: Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Ahner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Isaah for his crueltye, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite living then in Aegypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of gouernment vpon others; and vpon 45. ieaousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph: Only in the Kings throne will I be above thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land William Tyndale of Aegypt, William, Archbisshop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like or very same forme of gouernment by Viceroy, was in his time practised in Aegypt, hauing there bene in vse (as he beleueed) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Aegypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue bene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernment, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulene Elhadeth, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferior in wisdome.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Aegyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is not vnlikely that the vaine glorious Aegyptian Priests would as easly report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of of importance; and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers have mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus that Sesoftris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not have been, if Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoeuer meanes a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwaies passed by descent, and not by election: which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Aegypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either have beene intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or injoying their Fathers land, though not his estate, have bene more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Aegypt, and the King himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God made the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esay it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

Eph. 19.

§. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Cheneres, now it followeth to shew. Aegypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Aegypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Nihil patris Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, german ex pulchro progenies ortum: which muſt needs be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Aegypt, doth testify, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis saith, that the Aegyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalmes this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Orellius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the sacrifices of the Aegyptians this Countrey of Aegypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puta (saith he) Chama Nos filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum Osir, hodie Aegyptium lingua Kam vocari: that Aegypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Aegyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleaged, which I have already given in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600. Arphachshad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Saleis created by Manehoth, had in those long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Beon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris Orus, and Sesoftris. Reineccius in histor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwife called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Ham: Krentzheimius saith that Mizraim and Osiris are words of neere affinitie and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Aegypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Aegypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mesre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely let downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That hee is not vainly said by Ammius his Berosus, to have begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who

anoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well beleue; assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named onely according to the severall seats of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Aegypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Osiris.

The death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Affria: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Aegypt, Phenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and spaine: and having ended his Aegyptian warres, left the Kingdome to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdome of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree. Krentzheimius hercupon inferres, that fixe yeeres may be allowed to the warres, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Aegyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Osiris have beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzheimius was a greater Scholler in a Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Naigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would have bene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doublest) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Aegypt but seven yeeres before the death of Osiris: and have liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleued. For it was the same king who advanced Ioseph, bade him send for his Father; and gaue him leave to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funeral: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Osiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeere of Israels coming into Aegypt: we muſt needs cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzheimius coniectures his reigne to have continued: namely seven which hee should have liued after Iacobs coming into Aegypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Iosephs advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured 10. yeeres: After which proportion we may well give not onely fixe yeeres, as Krentzheimius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yet, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betweene the time of Iosephs being sold into Aegypt, vnto his advancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to have married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to have bene, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Aegypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon muſt needs have brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Aegyptian followers (many of whom he had found either fall-harted, or weak and vnclucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the laying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Putiphar Priest of Os, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, and his inuitious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife; and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Priests; when he bought the lands of all other Aegyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not unlike vnlike to the fierly booke of Asemah, Puiphur daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes vually by means: and that Puiphur was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Israhel died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian was considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuerthelesse I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwile than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostris.

Concerning the reigne of Typhon and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three yeeres to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptorie without proofe, as it is his owne word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alleging no witness, but as it were saying, Tese me ipso: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soone vnderake his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the same qualrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Auentinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules, seuen yeeres were spent, howsoever diuided betwene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeeres after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemeth that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israhel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account: who (according to Bernaldus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham 352
From that time to the Svocation of Abraham 75

which summe diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sesostris or Sesosthis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholastes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Historiours recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleet of ships on the red Sea: and so to haue entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Isfine entering in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Isfine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlike. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israhel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter: (as wee may reade more at large in the holy historie of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israhel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into India with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostris next to Orus: following the Scholastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For, as Isfine witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made warre on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse: Sesac had 60000. Sesostris had 8020. Chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostris made his expedition for no priuate purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose thich to succour Rehoboam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured euen against Salomon: therefore Sesostris must needs haue reigned whilest Israhel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succcede those fiftene gods, namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Meneas, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind; by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great vnderakings Sesostris was no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he fought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which hee was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: which neuer thelesse he is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirte three yeeres: after which time he chose rather to die then to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesostris left a sonne, whose name was Phoron or Phorons: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesostris; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindness Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nylus with a iaculine: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where expressed: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Bufris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Sesostris had bene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeeres at least. That Bufris began not vntill these 14. yeeres at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Bufris, to the departure of Israhel out of Egypt plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue bene 75. yeeres. That none came betwene Sesostris the second and Bufris or Orus the second, it stands onely vpon probabilities: which are these. After Sesostris had reigned somewhat, he fell blinde: after certaine yeeres he recovered his sight, as is said: which may haue bene true, but is more like to haue bene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reigne, before his blindness, and when he was well againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not very short. His words are largely set downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to haue bene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and fluces of Nylus: whom I thinke he rather frightened (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, then with darts, and iaculines; and by his diligent ouer-sight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Buſiris the first oppressor of the Israelites, and of his successor Queene Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Buſiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Buſiris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesoſtris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the oversight of those businesſes, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at others: wlesse hee have either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slacke in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Buſiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers, who also thinke that thereupon grew the fable of Buſiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Buſiris was of a new family, Remecius doth shew; who also thinke him Author of the bloody edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Buſiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Banning thinke to have lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Agypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesoſtris the second, how great the power of the Regent or Viceroy in Agypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Agypt, and all the Agyptians for bread, giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing; seeing also that when the Agyptians cried out upon Pharaoh, for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to have governed himselfe, would give such trust, & soveraigne authority, it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many have done) resigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sesoſtris. But whether Buſiris did usurpe the kingdome, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Buſiris were onely Regent, whilst the king lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesoſtris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature even when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Buſiris did it, vntill the first power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeeres which passed betweene the beginning of Sesoſtris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent, the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Buſiris or Orus the second, and his children. Buſiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I have read to have reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Acenensis: & out of Arrianus his History Meris: Ioseph calls her both Acencheres, & Thermutis. Epphanus in Panath saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Buſiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others: but but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesoſtris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaph Amenophis: and his daughter by the Agyptians called rather the neece or grand-child, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoſtris, and the disputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Buſiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-child, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and furnishing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

HE had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Remecius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine yeeres: after whom Cheneres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeeres, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon 10: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most doe stile Cheneres), a fighter against God, Acherres reigned 8. yeeres; and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Agypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not valkely: viz. That Agypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posterity seemes to have taken all 30. from Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned foure yeeres after Cherres: and Armais one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to have bene five yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwife Danauus; and his pedigree thus described by Remecius in Historia Italia.

Telegonus :
Epaphus :
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Buſiris.

Agyptus or Rameſſes who gaue name to the Countrie, hauing expelled his brother Danauus, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetra.

Danauus or Armeus expelled by his brother Agyptus, after hee had reigned five yeeres, became king of Arges in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should have occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to have bene borne in the time of Cheneres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danauus & Agyptus, otherwife called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Buſiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danauus and and Egyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Ammon or Danaus did succcede Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approuing him) reigned five yeeres. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameffes or Egyptus is that Armeffemianum or Armeffemianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Ediff made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Get thee out of Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successours from Thomasis (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne vnder Armeffemianum: and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seemes to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flourished either as a king, or a wise man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Cherres was King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderstood of Besris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeeres old: Rameffes, which was this Armeffemianum, being then king of Egypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referrre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Egypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpasse.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuey of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

Rue it is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are verie nere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon Saint Augustine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses liued in the time of Semiramis: but if hee did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the fame is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts there: absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Mosabites, or Edomites, while shee ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Appian, taken from Ptolemaic a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Amesif in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Historie the first booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Arges.

A fourth is borrowed from Tacianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Trojan warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that hee was adopted by Chemphis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanius Maurus) Thermothos. Eusebius also affirmeth; har by Eusebius in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuinctissimus is called Musaeus Iudaeorum.

Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manetho calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thomosis: the same perchance which Appian the Grammarians will haue to bee Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Seihosis: to whom Zysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus called also Spherus or Iphereus, gouerned Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Crisus the Argives; that then (Seihosis the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moyses ex Aegypto populum Dei nouo simo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium rege de cuius Dignitate Aug. 1. 18. c. 11

Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proued. S. Augustine affirmes (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Assyria: and that hee left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his successor Mamelus 30. yeeres; Spartetus after him 40. yeeres: in whole fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Ascatades followed Spartetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Crisus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeere of the Assyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mamelus, melus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparatus, these make 71. with which there were waited three yeeres of Cecrops: his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparatus successeur, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Egypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and lo it falleth right with S. Augustines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were opprest in Egypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, &c. 14. yeere, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 61. 10 yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they lived in great fertitude and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keepe them under with hardens: and they built the Cities, Pitbom and Ramases, &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their liues, by fore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vp on them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eighthieth yeere of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which hee performed in 2514. Worlds age: 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Cadoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Egypt, may the better be vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

His Citie which the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built seuen yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes, and so doth Hieremie, the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus, Protaides; after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thonis; Hicceppus, Thamma, and William Tyrius, Tapins. It adioyneth to the land of Gad, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which the Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnlkely to be same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Arianus affirmeth, that Abraham did reside at On, or Pharates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Heliopolis. Paginus, Vatablus, Iunius, and our English call it On, and Pitlomie, Ommu. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nile falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trisan, was the same which Vatablus and our English call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela, and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeeth; and Simoon Sethi, Fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Jacob inhabited, while hee liued in Egypt. In the confines of this Citie, Ommu, the high Priest of the Iewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferior to that of Hiersusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of respassian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Omus, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophetic of Esaie. c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Egypti; In that day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the middle of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Iewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Iesus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountaine taine is still found, called Iesus Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamm, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esaie and Ezekiel; the same which Herodotus the Prophet calleth Moph: which later name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowento the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabry; and Tuadensis Mizraim.

Pelufium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English write, Sin, the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quae olim dicta est pelufium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelufium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Dioffolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome conuerteth it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babylus, (for so Hierome and Ziegler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Bethsheth.

To make the storie the more perceivable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Heliopolis or Bethsheth, Balsaphon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stone. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arian Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Sic enim absque locorum observatione res gestae narrentur, aut sine Topographiae cognitione historia legantur, adeo confusa atq. perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit; si narratione (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

§. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

IN V to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and flauery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: in so much as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poudertie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolu'd to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que praeerant (saith Comestor) multitudinis observationem, who had command giuen them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wives of Egypt together, had beene a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diuersly disputed. S. Aug. Conf. 16. gustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulensis, and Peregrinus beleeue them to be Egyptians. Whofoeuer they were. when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that cruel murder, to the end the world might witness God to the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh these women filled with pietie, & the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affoording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue employed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloudie and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue become temporall, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the first of Exodus: Come, let us worke wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wilddome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they relie on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearly beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods marvellous workes taken out of Nilus, being therinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes; a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princessse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beautie, though but yet in the bloath, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preserue it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equal care to the soune of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, she called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glicas, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and hyses, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken.

Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before hee was put into the Arke of Reedes; & that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, perfectus est sapientibus Aegyptiorum Magistris, à quibus eruditur, saith Basil; vnto whom hee gave princely education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Aegyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Aegyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Aegyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Sax. Senensis hath gathered, wee haue added, betwene the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Athiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life; and that of Petrus of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

When Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Enselius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that he made against the Athiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Aderoe; and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of Athiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Commencior a prettie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skillfull in Astronomie, caused two Images to bee ingrauen in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie, the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reseruing the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worne, she began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband; and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leauing these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moses age, when hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention hee flew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnkowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neere Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because intercurrent betwene Egypt and Iudas, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble sheepeheard, sitting at a mountaines foot; a keeper and commander of those poore beasts onely.

20 In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; yet in that solitary Distant hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the pteasse of the world, and the troublesome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principallitie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (sæth Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At verò præfectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoq. Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contumelia sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductory exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselues in hunting, praefising on wilde beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the governments of gentle castell, haue a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subiects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheepeheardes of the people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion, That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the booke of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes; and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of his calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the mannailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euery-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be vnderstood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truly is; which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment;

ment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euerie short piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state, Exod. 14. 2. 7. *Vna est Dei & sola natura quæ verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed sum est. Cetera quæ creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit: It is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is; for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not beene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: *Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inani, aut fallax: The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull; in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and meete vanitie.

Of the tenne plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by charging the Rivers into bloud: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Fore-fathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angell of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast, and holy, because thou hast iudged these things: for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou giuen them blood to drinke.

Thereft of the plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps, by the death of their Cattle; by leprous Scabbes, by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse, after which Pharaoh forbid Moses his presence: moued the hardened heart of the vncleuing King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted, till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. Hethen, while he feared his owne life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reseruing their bestiall, but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) hee suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when euerie one of the Hebrewes had (according to direction from Moses receiued) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Passouer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Sauiour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euerie first-borne of Egypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vied after the Passouer, ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely marke their Sheepe and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserue them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farreth Succoth.

NOW, when the people were remoued, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despiight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desart of Escham; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them, hee determined to set vpon them in the plaines of Gosen, which way fouer they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not booked, the Brittaines vied against the Romanes, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Tophias affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. foot; which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things; either that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him at this time to giue assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Tophias partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixteene miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattel and Sheepe with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so hee lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becoming a Wife man, and a valiant and skillfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & commanded him not to dare come thenceforth into his presence after that he had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrews at Ramases in the 30 Territorie of Gosen: a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euerie Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Paste, not staying to make it into bread, knowing them that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was vtterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went vp armed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Escham, and incamped at Succoth; which hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had beene accustomed to begin their yeere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vfe. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vnto the beginning, middlest, or ending of the yeere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politicke yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euerie Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whole care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalender, was made publicke, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew heere at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betweene them and other Nations, in ordering the accompt of time.

The territorie of Gosen was afterward called Ramesses, after the name of this City, as appears in Gen. 47. 11. Num. 33. 6. Exod. 13.

THE Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, unto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lunarie yeere agree; which (besides the general inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed special Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so bene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeeres unequal, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more daies, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most savage of all people, when a yeere hath passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the marks of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteene yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, so that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moone to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change waies at one houre, but the yerely minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Heere lay much wisdom and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the yeere to containe three hundred and sixtie daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Græcian yeere (besides many collateral proofs) it is manifest by that which Plinie directlie affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius

Demetrius Phalerens, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inferred into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnities of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Electionem (which answereth in a manner to our Iune) they were careful to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of euery yeere; those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Badromion, (agreeing neerely with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to infer another for it in their fourth Lunary yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vp right, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December; which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also sought them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successively through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these marks which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past shee had done. This inuention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inferred into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vsed; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is 40. to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astrologer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Caesar made, who by aduice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heauenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Iulian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Caesar; yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, so which at the time of the Nicene Councell, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aquinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie retooled out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moueable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Councell they had bene. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Councell of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundred yeere, the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yerely course take vp full fixe houres about the 365. daies; but faileth so manie minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did need any nice curiositie of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neyther did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short yeere of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Heereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euently two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres, to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the feuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which laile of the yeere, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howfoeuer they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

Diuers haue diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner of their Intercalations. Sigonius tells vs, that euery second yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes; and therefore to haue added so many dayes to the end of the yeere, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begunas they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeere, or second yeere, as need required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeeres end vnto the other 12. This I beleeue to haue bene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit such as are grossly) some there are who say, that after three yeeres, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained sixe daies, namely, three summing that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly refused. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere, at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere, make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euen.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor denie, yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remoued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoynable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixth yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeeres, doe fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yeere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpe to make the yeeres ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeeres, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out of that way, of all other the secret. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written: Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sort of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, burthn at the very entrance of that fustnesse he should haue oueraken them, and destroy'd the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, of Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult: by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howfoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerrull God was such, by whose spirit, only wife, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victory to Almighty God, then either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant, and fate downe betwene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the fime which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specule, sine custodie; Lord of the watch-towre. For the Aegyptians beleuecd, or at least made their slauces beleeue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Aegyptians had gods for all turnes. Aegyptij dijssecundi, The Aegyptians were fruitful in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passage leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casotis the fairest and shorrest of all other, in respect of Iudaea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betwene the Mountaines, which somade a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brink and wasth of the Sea: inso much as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs suddain approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reas on offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

The Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who have heard of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, upon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharaoh conducted more by further discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was overtaken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to mention belueue not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there bene no other working power from above, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For wheredoeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downward towards the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol vnder Baulsephen (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea then Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past: who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: It is followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had bene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betwene two Seas,³⁹ and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharaoh by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue bene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue bene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues,⁴⁰ and the North. Which being vnkowne to Pharaoh: while he was cheeke by the Sea which vsed in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being employed by Pharaoh, and wanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grosse nesse, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharaoh) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrarie, but that Pharaoh might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee was answered by God: wherefore cryest thou vnto me: Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift vp on thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of Pharaohs approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands discovered.

discovered themselves betwene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters flowed out, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vpright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrey, on his owne Coast, & in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it coming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Egyptians had bene overtaken by the ordinary returne of the flood, before they could recover their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue bene carried with the flood which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue bene cast a shore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke²⁰ over against Baulsephen, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and runneth warr it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepeth the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcasses should haue bene carried, if the worke had not bene: supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the Countrey, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheeles were to be seene at a low water on the Egyptian lands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But hereof I leaue euery man to his owne belief.

Of the iourning of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

⁵⁰ A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BVt to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphir then governing Assyria, Orthopolis Syconia, or Peloponnesus, Crisus the Argines, Orius Egypt, 2437. in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his 25 14. his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the yeere 25 14. the last moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 25 14. was the celebration of the Passover: and in the dead of the night of the same day we call the first-born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 25 14. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall assembly at Ramses, and marched to Succoth.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holie Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And so at such time as Saladine the first past that way into Egypt, Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum peruenisset, loci illius incolae, Regis aduentu praecognito, nauiculae in ingredienti, in mare vicinam se conulerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach,ooke Boate, and fished themselves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned againe towards the South, and fare downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to bear armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vnderake or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of this second Moeth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desart of Zim, where the children of Israel murmured against Moses the third time, hauing want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of euery seuerall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is left downe.

Here it pleased God to send so many flocks of Quails, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselves with any of those: but reserved them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie miles: the one to Daphne, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim fixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repeated them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casual and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazards and traualles which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their owne freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

to

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and *Iethro*es coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be vterly wasted by so great a multitude of People and Cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needefull for the life of so manie beleebd them. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gaue charge to Ishua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulies for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God bene of farre greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnaquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaird in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazzard themselves.

Exod. 17.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbare to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till hee had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1 when Iethro the Priest of Madian, Moses Father in law heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai: where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v. 11 & 17. it is manifest; where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites; Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he gieth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the fixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Keturah: and might also take that name of Kenites from Keturah, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when hee led out of Egypt into Madian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethro Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesse. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites were the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to have beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 120000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wifes kindred inhabited, seeing himselfe coming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Valgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Iothor, Exod. 2. v. 1. c. 4. v. 18 & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10 & 12. and in 2 Num. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

Hereft of the months of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb; and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 1. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10 & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one, which hearde (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius, who in the yeere 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumes of France, and trauailed to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there felleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses's time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, (as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 22. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where the staid a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue dayes; for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kindes and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way disioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaves, and omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very finewes of euery Estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what hee hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancients, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the fittest makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedaemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedaemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans sometime from their first Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vsed. For if wee consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also surpasse that title; according to the generall acceptance of the word Law: of which Esay Voe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vsed for the immutuable resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnjust: Mala lex est, quae mutuantur postea est: It is an ill Law that is made amultually. So as all ordinances, eyther good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem somitis, is to be vnderstood: For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as elsewhere, this morall habit of disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But see another law in my members; rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclination of all creatures are sometime called, lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Also priuate contracts among Merchants and other Tradef-men, doe often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitee. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquae, are by Thomas called violentes magis quam leges; rather compulsion then lawes: And whatsoever is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoever established: for he callsthem iniqua hominum constituta, quae nec cura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The vnjust constitutions of men which are neither to bee termed nor thought lawes. For faith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt factiva, & conseruatiua factitatis; Iust Lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euermlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, faith Plato, is God and his worship: Finitis leges Deo & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando of reading or binding: Leges quia leguntur à populo latae, faith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might read them, & behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologie, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as conferre iugum meum, disperum vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Couenanti it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word diathen, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuell for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due, the power of the law is the power of God: iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the Law, is the reigne of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vite regula, praeceptis quae sunt sequenda, & quae fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to fli from: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the Law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen aliam voluntatem; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Civile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two general words Ius and Ius: whereof Ius, faith he, hath reference to men, Ius to God. As lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both these words: as Eas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the olde substantiue Noun iustus, a bidding or commandement: or perhaps from the Greeke ius, which is the name of iupiter, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that iur-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum (for so we finde it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture call it iuramentum libona) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Viceregents the Magistratus, hee is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iust is denominated, iustus iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

But because lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leaving the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeternus diuina sapientie con-ceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso praecognitarū. The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdom as it is referred to the government of things fore-known by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuina sapientie; quatuor rei omnes ad determinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum maximam aliquid nec cessitatis adferat: It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things 30m such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their general natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnder-standing directeth all these to their proper ends, so it is called prouidence: but as it impos-eth a necessitie according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.
Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & ad delicta auocans: quoniam tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quoniam breuius lex vera atque princeps, optata diuina, & ad delicta ratio est recta summi Iouis: That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (faith he) then beginne to bee a law 40 when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true Law and a fit Princesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to di-uers objects, so the reason of man findes it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c.
but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto refer-50 red, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely: a liueli euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The law humane or temporall is also thence drawn: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures,

creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heavens of heavens, for he hath established them for euer by euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Depths: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormie windes, which execute his Word: mountaines, and hills, fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatiude being both the attractive, and the end) to all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowe cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heauy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoever is apposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribeto common nature: others to fate, a difference vied intermes onely; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnis super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselves thence deniued: there vnder subiected: thence from his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or apperition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aeterna est, qua iustum est et omnia sunt ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Padagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; whic time of expiration some thinke our Sauour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauour to haue no other signification, then that now the prophetic of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, consummatur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Salomon, And being one (see) can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe remaineth all.

§. VI. Of the Law of Nature.

 The law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: onely as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. Vipian defines the naturall law to be the (same) which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Iustitia non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terra marique nascuntur, anim quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produce.

Aug. in Epist. ad Rom. 2. 14. in Evangel. Joh. 1. 9. de Civitate Dei. 1. 2. de Natura et origine animae. 1. 1.

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, enlightning our formall reason; so it is more then sense in Beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flie from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer seene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter; Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twiggies which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to saue their egges and young ones from the Monkeys, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmito, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternitie provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to chooe them others besides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Valenia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of prauine reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to Dauid sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end, which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increated and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the Law: they haue not the Law, are a Law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; in arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

Rom. 2. 14.

Rom. 2. 15.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law vnto himselfe (while hee hopeth to abuse the world by the aduantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne soule, by crafty vnrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth vs not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, sed flos ille, dum loquimur, arefcit; Thos flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabite and dwell within our felues, and become fearefull witnessers of our secrettest euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras as teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to be knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but aboue all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to giue heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is heaptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue; and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imputed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the herbe which seedeth seede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. He gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes; the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Caine perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whosoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done vnto him againe. And that this iudgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doe not well, sinne lyeth at thy doore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this subiect.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill shunned) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things more desired as good, or to be auoyded as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to escape hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are, in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to prouide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no prooffe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalm approueth: Recte quidem Bonum definitur, quod omnia expetunt; Recte hauc some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as we haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of sensory senses; but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satietie, nor hurt vs with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preservation of life and being: so it meete, euen by the Law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carry vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers Lawes vnto them: In which sense the Cuiusdam define 2. Natural right, or law naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Law, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it, where Vipian affirmeth, that Law naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Law is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vipian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Law naturale, the other Law gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restrain the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as he is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our felues: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or morie faculty, which is but one, stirring vp to good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoyded: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason, in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruing the law of nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adueniente mandato, peccatum reuincit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by Saint Paul, When the Commandement came, sinne reuined. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by Saint Paul, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not conuenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right and good reason. And therefore, saide Damascene, Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrary to L. s. Vid. orth. nature: and Saint Augustine, Omne vitium naturae nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary vnto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so strait, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enjoy the fruites of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

And though the Law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law shee suffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, then the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

Aug. de Ciuir.
Dei lib. 1.

AFTER the eternall, and naturall, the law positiue or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine and Humane. Again, the diuine positiue law is double; the Olde and New: The Olde was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had floode 2512. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Asctades or Afcades governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argines, Cecrop Athens, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receyued. For the very word Nomas, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no nor in Homer time, who liued after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprest wil in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the Law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than or to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefeft.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is vndefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndchiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of inward motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiões hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente deciderent; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minds.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of trueth, which by reason of diuersified opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also sayde Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing wisdom to children.

§. VIII. Of the unwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betweene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests: and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, referred in the bosoms of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeede the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarkes, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam or Adamsh, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not only to beasts, but to his 10 Children and Nephewes, which afterward his illnes imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruites, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabit with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto 20 Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandement God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we find that the vnnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and 30 Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dims's forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar. That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife. To these we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be saide, not only to haue bene written in the hearts of 40 men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarkes. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: to euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moyses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoeuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. When it is opposed, or differentiated from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

Rom. 3. 28. When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 13. When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

John 1. 17. When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as, The Law was given by Moses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Gal. 3. 22. Luc. 16. 6. Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifieth the whole policy of the Jewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7. 23. The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the Law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, Who soeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vied by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apud peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, qua est ultimus humanae vitae finis; The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

Rom. 7. 12. The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord, whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for eternall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common-weale of the Jewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it saide of Saint Paul, The commandement is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part touching the gouernment of the Common-weale of the Jewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kinds of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beafts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Pascheouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beafts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purtyings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty euen to beafts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some reſerue these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: saving in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vse charitie

one towards another: which for euer shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, & for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs coming, and in a farre lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equity thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadows) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A propos of all of nine other points: to be considered, with a touch of the fine first.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old & new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maiesty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, so he only gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end & reward promised, to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels: as it is said. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in Galath 3. 19 the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disinterested: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham and his seede: not vnto his seedes, as to Esaus and Jacob. but to his seede, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seede were the promises made: see Isaiah Gal. 3. 6. not to the seedes, as speaking of many, but to thy seede, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandements receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fit consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or or signe of our Iustification : but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were finnes forgiven, who took away the finnes of the world : and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and iustifie. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body ; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

§. XI. Of the first point, so wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

The Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation : as the Olde by workes, the New by grace : but in the thing selfe, or object and remote end, they agree : which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament ; which is an explication of the Old : from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doeth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated : In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliuered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perillable, but the New was giuen in a promise of an euertlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps a Testament and Gospel for euer during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chiefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and chiefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption : the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof. The word Euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vied it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Elsay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace : Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of saluation, as in Luce 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ : and so we vnderstand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Damas comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ : the olde proposing him as to come, the new as already come ; one and the same thing being promised in both ; both tending to one, and the same end : euen the saluation of our soules : which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obliuious the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings : yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hiernusalem : according to the place of the Hebrewes : All those dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them farre off, and benewed them ; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine : Omnino pauci veterem legem intellegunt, non attendentes tendentes per promissa terrena aterna promitti : Few (saith he) do vnderstand the old law : not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome : Noluit Deus pascere Iudeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Iudei somniant ; God would not feed the Iewes as beasts with corporal gifts and riches, as they themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus uiuus, & ero uobis in Deum ; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perillable things, that God gaue them this promise, but in respect of the future to wit, the safety of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaured for, which liueth euer.

The agreement betwene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apostles and Prophets ; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured : the Fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall food, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercy and saluation : to which the Law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith : the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth : the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth ; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth : Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae egrotantes probaret ; The Law was giuen, not to helpe, but to discover sickness : and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, ut homo inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quereretur ; The Law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection : not that his disease was thereby helpe, but that he might then seeke out the Physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Son ; so the greatest benefit was referred to bee brought, as by the wortheist person, saith Cyrl : For this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII. Of the rest of the pointes proposed.

The seventh consideration is of the end, and vfe of the law : which is to bring vs to Christ : for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vmost end : the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God : who knowing so perfect a law, do not keepe it : the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience : but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chiefe end of the law, is as hath bene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and prefigure, the place of the Church and true people of God : and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the comming of Christ : after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vfe of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vfe of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conformance our selues.

The fence and vnderstanding of the Law is double, littirall and spirituall : by the littirall we are taught the worship and seruice of God : by the spirituall, the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ : before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the

Crosse, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vail of the Temple rent asunder, noting that the ceremoniall vail and shadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe severely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much reioyced, as he preferred the oblation of the Law, before all that the world could yield. In via testimoniorum tuorum delestatum sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldst say, Who shall goe up for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to beare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall goe over the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very nere unto thee, even in thy mouth, & in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his waies, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it said in vaine in Saint Matthew. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata: If thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn; Scio quia mandatum eius vita eterna est; I know that his Commandement is life euermlasting. And if this be the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly hee is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mansability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) propoeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not greuous, 1. Iohn 3. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to iudge, by what easie persuasions, we steale away from our owne power, as unwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are weinticed to the breach of this precept? seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Vnity, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for euery of them, Which giuech to beasts their food, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the deuill crept into them, and (hauing blotched out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisedome of Solomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assist once in our iournies of him that cannot go, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, be more senselesse: David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them. Psalm 135. 18.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corrupted nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euermlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the deuill brought vp among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to couetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giuech no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most saluage Nations of the world do not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giuech rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God giue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on vs the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporal and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering so them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not do the actes following the offences of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (saith Basil) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work (such as it is). And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginitie haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the grate: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beaurty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had bene vsed in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poore and miserable foules, whom hunger and extreame necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeves, who to maintain themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkenesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouersishing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these these Hell-hounds. And if euery man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to obserue; so esteemed by reason of our fraille affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may reframe and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, & seeke for grace. How the word Conueting reacheth to all those it is to bee considered. For Concupiscencia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An vnbriodel, or unrestrained appetite of hauing: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selues by any naturall frailty, or vnadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbriodel euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quia est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated vpon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quamuis refragmur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eis dominari permitimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandment, not only the outward acte, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbriodel, others bidden, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandment forbidden, together with the outward acte: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandment, wee must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, euen those which wee resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridlth his euill desires, bee much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue the at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doeth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridlth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeouours to keepe his commandments, we witness our loue toward himselfe: we may not safely giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accursed, (saith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things possible to be obserued: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus *qui dicit impossibile Deum precepisse; Accursed is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasion, or without betraying of our selues, doe our faithfull endeouours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, David witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruants, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustificed. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinne hath not: And againe, Who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne greuous without deliberation, let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or reframe himselfe in all that he can, yea, or no: For when a King giues to his subiect a commandment vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shuffling excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.*

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

20 And if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull providence in the chioise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes stricke to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeouours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enjoy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of ciuill men, and not of sauaiges. And hereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonies, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to recieue thence-from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therein with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witness for him, when hee may iustly vie his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requieth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorn and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

50 If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could lay vnto himselfe; This is my some: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeavour by vertue and vnder-taking to raise Families: murders and poisonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perish, or liues as the saluages; by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witnesses, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull laborer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The coueting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertains to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we do attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiles or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our felus shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing: Surely for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & provident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probate; to be customs approved by antiquity or vnwritten laws. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, &c. the customes of Cassil, and other Provinces.

The second are thefe petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannerie of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought euery custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractus temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Vlpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractus temporis conualsecere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that euery custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, & therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue beene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law, Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against Law: saue by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of practique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed: Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduisement of wisdom, & the restraint restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit, All that stands with reason.

Lastly and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publike authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying, Mixta esse non videtur, quae iusta non fuerit, it seems to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracie, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulterij, alia Cornelia de Sycarijs; The Law of Iulian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Rustians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Vlpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Civile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Vlpian, Ius civile neque in totum a naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit: itaque cum aliquid addimus vel de iustitia iudicauimus iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Civile efficitur; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as wel out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquius then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, shed, with the name, yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelve Tables. To these Lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebi-scita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate, which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes; and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Iustinian afterward were.

The difference anciently betweene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraigne authority (be the soveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Insum Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Quisplurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt. They who ascribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-weale, or Church, Illud naturæ legem, hoc divini præstat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God. And so may ius Civile be taken two wayes, first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and differs from the Ecclesiasticall. But this division of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a Law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kinds, the Civil which hath every where a voyce; and is in all Christian Estates (England excepted) most powerfull; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Civil, they have the customes of Castill, and other Provinces. In France besides the Civil, the customes of Burgundy, Flays, Berry, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux jura & us en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les custumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kinds; General, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation have these words; Non autem, registrum prædictum, res laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient customes we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certain Maxims by those customes of the Realme approved. Upon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England have beene approved by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, diseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest sonne should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that have not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanistrie. For example, if a Lord of Land have four sonnes, and the eldest of those four haile also a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the custome being grounded grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having alwayes lived in a subdivided Civil Warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforced to leaue successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Counties, besides the great and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, so the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Actes of choise, and (saith desire) Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent quam quod iudicio populi receptæ sunt; The lawes we observe do therefore binde the subject, because they are received by the indgement of the subject. Tum de manu humana leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane lawes have their strength, when they shall not onely be desired, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth their properties to every Christian Law, that the same bee honest, that it bee possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Country; also for the time and place convenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of priuate profite, that it be written for the generall good. He also giues foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and infigation: the former bindes vs by feare, to auoide vice; the latter incourage with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum; It becometh the Law to bee a mender of vices, and a commander of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the obseruation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes: and it is two-fold; the one contrainth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactiue and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Infigation, or incorage-ment to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, iurge vs to well-doing; laying before vs the good and the euill, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmatiue commanding good, and power negatiue forbidding euill, are those into which the law is diuided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum; Decline from euill, and do good.

§. XVI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

⁴⁰ NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that haue written of this subject, as well Diuiues as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soueraigne Princes bee compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directive, the other Coactiue: to the power Directive they ought to bee subject, but not to that which contrainth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to giue a preiudiciall iudgement against himselfe; and if equals haue not any power ouer each other, much lesse haue inferiours ouer their superiours, from whom they receiue their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of Lawes, simply then is the Prince so much aboute the lawes, as the soule and body vnited, is aboute a dead and senselesse carkeffe. For the King is truly called, Ius viuum, & lex animata: An animate and liuing law. But this is true, that by giuing authority to lawes, Princes both adde greatnes to themselves, & conferue it; and therefore was it said of Bracton out of Iustinian, Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the law first attributeth to the King; for it is the law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Bracton ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes diuine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembered by the Diuiues and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, then the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God onely.

Tibi soli peccasti, faith David, Against thee onely have I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be faide to be subiect to the Law, Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativa: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humana non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq. lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transmutandi aliud. Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the law-maker himselfe: for every actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliuerethers from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps suae legislatori suae voluntate prohibito ab obligatione legis liberare. Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges obseruare necessitate coactionis, ut Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis. The subiects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presumo digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that wee ought not to seeme wiser then God himselfe, who hath told us that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be gouerned by. True it is, that all Nations haue their seuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne apply, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion, or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Viues was denied vnto them. I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously then seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forceth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publicke approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wise and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required, euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that wee are ceyed to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heavy: for to shew more rigour then Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath beene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither wil I take vpon me, to speake any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the dedence of it hath alwayes beene very plausible. And surely howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue beene witness, of whom Fortescue saith that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistresse was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) grieuouly lamented: but this Iudge, faith the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi sulsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facti ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yield vnto the Metaphisiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphisiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consultat eternam, de qua nulli animo iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if hee be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, then to the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. I. Of the numbering and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness, with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troupes.

When Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and SancTuary, he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing scene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age upwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent.

number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Aegypt; This great Army was diuided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Nasfon: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliah. All were the first that moved & marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incampment on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joynt vnto it Simcon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simcon 59300. vnder Shelamiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Elisaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were ioyned the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, ioyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamlid: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidan.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were ioyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abieser: Asher 41500. vnder Pagid: Nephtali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that murmur and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutinies, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedence and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah, Jacobs wife. Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place; accompanied with his brother Simcon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Iosaph, who intemporally blessings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophesying place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best-beloued brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophesie. He had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 20000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gershurites on the West, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Elisaph commanded, in number 7500. The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side, guided by Elisaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betwene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zurriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan. On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuitical Families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching, the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the prouisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemne removing thereof; the vigilante attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Brownist, and other Selfish, as all cost and care bestowed on and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Papery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inso-much as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would turne out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, if it be want of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kinds of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inso-much, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no lesse variable then contrary to it selfe, the Faith of Men will soone after decay by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Liburan: Si me adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video. sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; If I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you: What I should anioide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twaine Princes: the Passouer of the second yeere: The departing of Iethro.

Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbered his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Cohath, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershon and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine silver, weighing 330. sheckles, a silver Bull of 70. sheckles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cuppes of gold, of ten sheckles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards

The Hebrew Gersh weigheth fiftie grains: so a Gersh that silver is about three half-pence sterling: the siele of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 38. 12.) contained 20. Gershs, so a Sanctuary Sicle of silver sheweth 660. the common Sicle is but halfe as much. to wit ten Gershs: as it is finally expounded; though Isid. and Tabern. goe prone in the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one. Num. 9. vers. 5. Num. 10. 11. Exodus, vsq. 24. Numbers 2. 17.

their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bolles, mounted vnto 2400. shekles of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. shekles of gold; which makes of shekles of silver 1200. every shekel of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second month of the second yeere: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from aboute the Tabernacle as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Rise vp Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Thence all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Nahshon, taking the Vanguard, followed by Netaneel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnthought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their iourney towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudgement (as appeared by the Counsell hee gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges over the people) so he was a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of foules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vse many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by setting things in order, then to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFTER this diffinition of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Deserts of Paran: and after three dayes wandring, they late downe at the Sepulchers of Iust, afterward called Tabera, or Incenso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Muriners and Murriners which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Month. And from this 23. day of the second Month, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to call vpon them) to the 24. day of the third month, to wit, all the month of Sinay or Iue: whereof sursaisting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following month, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seven dayes, after whose recovery Israel remoued toward the border of Adumma; and incamped at Kades, neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Countrey; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riuers, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerlye past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefites, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their delinquance from the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernes (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preserued them, but to bring them, and their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Gynallike (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grasshoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choosethem a Captaine (or as they call it now adays, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery soule of the whole multitude (Joshua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountain foote of Idumma, which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glory between the vnadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his seruants, preserued them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and merellese pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alleging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deservedly soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire, the same being once kindled by the violent breach of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heauy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (euermore ielous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished, referring his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserue, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrated.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had reuealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heauy displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moses, who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his covenant should not moue, but by His direction; who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto benedicted and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Israelites, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered, and might then haue entered Idumma before their enemies were prepared and joyned, did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vnderake the enterprise of themselves, and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumma. There

the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioyned, and attending their advantage, feroe them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their dilplantation and destruction threatened. Of which powerfull attempts to prevent those two Nations (afflicted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioyned semberly of those two Nations) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him together for their common safety. For he commanded him to returne by those another way, than that formerly intended. Through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the bankes of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came back to passe ¹⁰ ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Aegypt (Moses, Ioshua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and carelesse generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Molech, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen, as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proued out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commandement receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he remoued to Remmonparez, to call for abundance of Pomegranates there found and he remoued to Libnah, thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frandiuid among them. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and fared downe at Refsa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata, where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which Moses alwayes keeping the Valley, betweene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Simne, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada, then to Macelath, and then to Thabab, and so to Thara or Thare, the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram, who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath beene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods, euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-wealth of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes, of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried vVands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable sprout, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Thara the whole Army remoued to Meibraz, and thence to Esfongaber, and thence to Moseroth, (or Masrit, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beneiacan, and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgata, thence to Setabata, the thirtieth Mansion, where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Esfongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Esfongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the fœmie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia receiued the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Setabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the fœuenth Verse, is also called Setabata, or Setabath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adioyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea, at Esfongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recouer the bankes of the Red Sea.

From Setabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebron, and from thence to Esfongaber: which City in Iosephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieroms, Efla. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Esfongaber being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses trauielled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esfongaber or Afongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is saide, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor; neere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esfongaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect vnto the Idumæans. Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained those places: for it is saide; And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumaea, into Aegypt, when he fled from Isab. Likewise it is saide of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of shippes in Esfongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kadès: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esfongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadish: or in Bereth, of the children of Iacan; where they laye downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Aegypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking ende at Esfongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen, by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the Earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their misaduentures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entered into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of

God

Num. 20. 9. God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neuerthelſe, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the trauailes of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depoyled of the garments of his Priesthood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar defended the Mountaine; but G O D receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more to seene.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwife Mofera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mofera, which was the seauen and twentieth Manſion; and Mofera which they write Moferath for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Manſion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Eſiongaber, incamped at Mofera, after hee departed from Heſmons, and before he came to Bemaacan. And this Mofera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed, the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Manſion. But for Hor, which is also called Mofera, it should to haue bene written, Hor iuxta Mofera; Hor neere Mofera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whercof the West part Moses calleth Mofera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses incamped, as hee paſt towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, praying him that he might paſſe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereſt way of all other from the City of Kadeſh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riuer, the ſtorme way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perſwade the Prince of Idumaea hereunto, Moses remembred him, that hee was of the ſame race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the ſonnes of one father, to wit, Iſaac; inſinuating thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and reſpect them, than hee had to aſſiſt the Canaanites; against whom Eſau his Anceſter had made warre, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient race) descended of Cham out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. He also making a ſhort repetition of Gods bleſſings beſtowed upon them, and of his purpoſes and promiſes; aſſured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waſte his Countrey, but that hee would reſtrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatſoeuer he viſed, yea, euen for the water, which themſelues or their Cattell ſhould drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Eſau. But the King of Edumaea knowing the ſtrength of his owne Countrey, the ſame being neere Canaan, rampard with high and ſharpe mountaines: and withall ſuſpecting, as a naturall wiſe man, that 600000. ſtrangers being once entred his Countrey, it would reſiſt in their willes to giue him law, reſolutely reſuſed them paſſage, and deliuered this anſwer to the

And not knowing whether ſuch a deniall might ſariſhe or exaſperate, hee gathered the ſtrength of his Countrey together, and ſhewed himſelfe prepared to defend their paſſage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses conſidering, that the end of his enterpriſe was not the conqueſt of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promiſed was that of Canaan: like vnto himſelfe who was of naturall vnderſtanding the greateſt of any man, & the ſkillfulleſt man of war that the world had, he reſiſed led to aduerture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gaue but a paſſage to inuade others; and which by reason of the ſteate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at leaſt) greatly enfeebled the ſtrength of Israel, and rendered them leſſe able, if not altogether powerleſſe, to haue conquered the reſt.

§. V I.

Of their compaſſing Idumaea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

10 Therefore leauing the way of Idumaea, turned himſelfe towards the Eaſt, and marched towards the Deſerts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderſtood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumaea, and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it ſafeſt, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey; than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses bene enſoſt firſt to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumaea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue leſſened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwiſe than Arad hoped for, yet being reſolued to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came neerer his owne home, leading the ſtrength of his Nation to the edge of the Deſert, he ſet vpon ſome part of the Army, which, for the multitude occupied a great ſpace, and for the many herds of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe ſo neere together, but that ſome quarter or other was euermore ſubiect to ſurpriſe. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perſeuerance vnſuſpected, hee ſlew ſome few of the Israelites, and carried with him many priſoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predeceſſour, which ioynd his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an overthrow to thoſe mutinous Israelites, Num. 14. 45: which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it ſeemeth that the greateſt number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the firſt of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are ſaide to haue braten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the ſame that had avictory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predeceſſour that then prevailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was firſt to be inuaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpoſe to compaſſe Moab, determined while he was yet in the Deſert to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verſe of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites vntely deſtroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much miſtaken that thinke, that this deſtruction was preſently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderſtood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iofua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the purſuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deſerts of Zin and Moab; and haue ſerch a wearifome and needleſſe compaſſe, by the Riuer of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it ſelfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (ſo ſo ſure the Israelites after their victory purſued the Canaanites) is ſo ſet in the South of Idumaea. There is alſo a City of that name in Sinai. But there is no ſuch place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed preſently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the ſame was obtained in the future, and in Iofua his time, and not at the inſtant of Arads aſſault. For had the Israelites at this time ſackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is alſo water and bread. But it was in the time of Iofua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had paſt Jordan: Iofua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verſe, nameth this Arad by the name of his City Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites purified the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Iamua and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error; and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them to againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement for vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth betweene the Red Sea, and Caelogryia, encamped at Zalmoma: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent, making these journeys by the edge of Iamua, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam qua habet à latere mare rubrum; by the way that sided the Red Sea, but in dedee they croft, and went thwatt the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, so that is, to Esfongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so it lay to shunne the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, croft the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entered the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Supha, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Aburim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hilles, on the East border of Moab. From thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, so and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab, which Hierome the Prophet Chap. 28. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Aburim: though in the 23. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Heldondiblahaim, but speaketh of his removal from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon, calling Arnon the border of Moab, betwene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the situate of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Balaac Peer then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the 40 Amorites, to desire a passage through his Country: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vnder-tooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successors, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words; When thou comest neere unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite it: all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue observed to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Quint. c. 21. v. 13.

Now concerning the Warre betwene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this Story to that Booke entituled, Liber bellorum Domini: The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memoramemorable, with greater breuety in this place. His words after the Geneua Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zool, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneua and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Supha, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text readeth thus. Idcirco dicit seler in recessione bellorum Ichoua, contra Vahabumum. Regime Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Armonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the 10 battailes of Ichouah, against Vahab in the Country of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers & of the force of the word Suph, also ch. 18. §. 3.

In which words he vnderstands, that amongst the warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vahab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vahab was the immediate predecessor of Balaac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balaac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For it seemes (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were elective, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this Translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Booke of Judges. Scyriades c. 46. tells vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Iosua. Who was there (saith he) ipse iam like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue beene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Herthen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, how fouler they haue beene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaeus, and cited by Origen in 472, and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembered by Iosua c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iasher, or Iuistorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middle of the Heauens is recorded; and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David took the precept, of teaching the children of Iuda, to exercise their bowes against 40 their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth psalme, verse 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinks, that David by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the actes of the iust Abraham, of Iaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosua, by an vnkowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the bookes of Semaiah and of Iddo, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. pertained: and that of Iehoua the sonne of Hamani, of the acts of Iehouaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hafcirim, of 5000. verses, of ness of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay vp the Booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that he indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens and I will speake, and let the Earth heare the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and farrowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW lets a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which haue beene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall find that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when hee fought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's owne daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation, euen then, when he fought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceiued of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to flee into Midian: the contention betweene the Shepherds of that place, and Leibis Daughters, made him knowne to their Father: who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heerd-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein hee first suffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be saide of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renouue in other Nations; about the times of Moses and Iosua, with the summe of the History of Iosua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue Warre, were diuers wages, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

LIKE manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the Wilderneesse, or afterward: we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing prouidence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Han: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuinity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serue for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, wee must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: by proccesse of time diuided into severall Families and names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamuzzims, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries: the rest were the Zidomians, Iebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hittites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Countrey: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more then the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possesse themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equall in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites and Ammonites: of Esaue the Idumians: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue bene a Tribe of Edom, because Esaue had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason con-

unceth it to haue bene otherwife. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael the eldest sonne Naboth sprang the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabulhai. Now euen Abraham besought God to blese Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelue Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Hauilah vpon Tigris, and Sar which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of the seclater named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not vnitied, in and among themselves, but that they had their ieaousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or vnitied, they were taught by the care of their owne preferuation, to ioyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumaeans onely denied the Hebreues a passage: which the Mosabites durst not denie: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselves had lately bene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiaent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountaines which diuided it from Rafan. Again, that which moued the Mosabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Mosabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying betwene the mountaines of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Mosab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as aforesaide, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Amorites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were descended from Abraham kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Perigreues, God permitted some enmities to be as it were prefiges of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incited, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disdaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Iacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might scorne to giue place, much lesse to subiect themselves to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for more aggrauation, the issues of Esaue Princes of Edumaea, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Iacob taking his aduantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Iacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Sir or Edumaea.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a feede or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the instigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar: and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to releue them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumaeans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esaue tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Eloa, the Elitite, and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon the Heuite, Lord of Sir, before the same was conquered by Esaue, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaea.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Mosabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceesse of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warres of the Israelites.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Peigrée) we find foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Iosua, though few of these named, otherwife than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderstood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderstand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seauen principle Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherite their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choysed places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Lewis slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their filters rauishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Esdra and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the wildernesse in the edge of Edumaea.

The third named was Sehon King of Essebon, who before Moses arrival had beaten the Mosabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea or Nabathaea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he tooke Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Precisely after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountaines Traconi or Galaad and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fift was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Iosua nameth foure other Kings.

Hobam, King of Hebron.

Piram, King of Iarmuth.

Iapia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell: and hanged by Iosua. After this ouerthrow Iosua nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and Iobab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughterd, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some Dominion ouer the rest; for it is saide in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adonizedek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cutt off the thumbs of the hands and fette of seauenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Iuda and Simeon had vsed the same exequution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iosua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he opprest twenty so yeres after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Deborah) ouerthrew, and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Mosabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathaea to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethogues or Iethores, saith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Iudges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexanis, or Ioksham, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura.

Coloss. p. 8. thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Ishro if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seaven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Ragnels surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gaue them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountaines of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Heuse of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Iebusite, King of Hierusalem
6. Hobam of Hebron
7. Piram of Iarmuth
8. Iapia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Iabin of Hazor
11. Iobab of Modon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Iabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Eui or Euis.

Rekam or Rekem who built Petra the Metropolis of Petra, so called by the Greekes: and vexed Israel seuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6. 7. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuite of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands vpon Zebah and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III. Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according vnto the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hamilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cetur, that that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue bene, and so were the Madianites) themselves taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planned that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitful though adjoining to the Desert, in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabatheas: the same which neighboureth Iudea on the East-side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathai (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his owne name to the East-part of Basan, or Basanea, which was afterward posselt by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Traceni, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampadius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie Cedarans. Abel face downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue name to the Adubens, which Pytolmy calleth Agubens.

Misjan was the Parent of the Masamancses, neere the Mountain Zarnath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raubens were of Mishma: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfes, where Pytolmy setteth Zagmar.

Of Dama were the Dumaans, betweene the Adubens and Raubens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Masfa the Masani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Asbrita, who bordered the Napathans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Iurians, or Charnathens: of whom Tobn was King in Dauids time. Of Napiri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadecer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Asite: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Asad, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when Exod. 17. of allimes they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadesbarne. After the gouernment of Othonid, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hamilah to Shur.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after David became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse.

In Ezekiels time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were wasted and displanted by the children of Simcon.

§. IIII.

Of the institution of ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HERE liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discouer a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Aradia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them wishall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsely those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur; of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starrs, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vseth fire, as thereby he gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but external forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrails the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heaenly bodies, for so it is said: Idem aleissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno celo quam longissimè astra, signorum obitus, et ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discern a farre off the settings and risings of the Starrs: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it other wise, and others diuersly.

Of this Mans knowledge Æschylus giues this testimonie.

*Ast agebant omnia
Visors ferebat: donec ipse repperi
Signorum obitus, ortusq. qui mortalibus
Sunt utiles: et multitudinem arum
His repperi: componere inde literas;
Matremq. Musarum auxilio Memoriam
Permisit cunctis, &c.*

But Fortune gouern'd all their workes, till when I first found out how Starrs did set and rise: A profitable art to mortall men: And others of like use I did deuise: As letters to compose in learned wise I first did teach: and first did amplify The Mother of the Muses Memorie.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Phrygius sayes that he liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Tapetus, of whom though it be said, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Tapetus, Æschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the evening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hos, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec uero Atlas sustinere celum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uicore uolatur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to beare up heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stellerized; unless their diuine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturne, as Rheæ coniuice alme Promethen. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archæus the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the invention. Of this Aræus Arcadia in Poloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Aræadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens prior illa; Quid, de fessis; fun; which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had beene any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferiour bodies. And though there be that below the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isaacus Tetzzer, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequall and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesius, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phæton.

ND in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the sonne of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him

Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion, for else either Phyffes was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Phyffes after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie; by which in effect euery soule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood vniuersall. Only Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

Vixit: aut illa reuerentior colla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotum; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Doue, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had bene but an imitation of Noahs flood deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is said to haue begot Dolphus, which gaue name to Delfhos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phæton; not only in Æthiopia, but in Bria, a Region in Italie, and about Cume, and the Mountaines of Vesuius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

Vt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Thymegistus, or Ter maximus, and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustinus & Laëtantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same which that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Tewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to haue giuen them Lawes. But Diomed affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying, That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwile Theues; whom Philo so before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sancioniatho, who liued about the warre of Troies, the inuention of letters. But Saint Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calles neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slaine Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives vpon Saint Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembered. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bæotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argines; with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuentyeres; after him Danaus fifty yerres; after him Lyncæus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Bæotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Tewes; of whom the Phenicians their Neighbors receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Tewes and the Phenicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit: Diomed makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternel grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diomed, call the Counsailler and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giueth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Dionysius Scytus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vives vpon the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of Saint Augustine, De Ciuitate Dei, conceiueth, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. Sancioniatho, an ancient Phenician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury, affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phenicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians Thout, or Thoth. It may be, that the many yerres which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yerres, gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, y and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Egyptian Wisdome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolute, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes corrupted, or by his heart and Spirit deuiled. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that famed Ficinus, had bene found in all things like them; I thinke it had not bene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuiled by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue bene Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the expolition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Sapaneophane, which is as much to say, as ascenditorum repertor; a finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Enuie & aged time hath partiedefected, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Laëtantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinorum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summæ ac singularis Dei asserit, & semper nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec habet written many bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which hee affirmeth the Maiestie of the most high and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee do so. The same Father also searcheth not to number him among the Sydes and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whosoever is found in him contrary therunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vitta, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eius esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & epifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operative, falling upon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate enim esse Deum asserit; Because hee spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic rumans (saith Ficinus) præuidit præce Religiosis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem sancti, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurius foresaw the ruine of the olde or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the Blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suidas. Hæc enus filius pulvis a patria, vici peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repto: cumq; post paulum a vobis corpore vinculis absolutus discessero, videretis me quasi mortuum lætatis: Nam ad illam optatam beatam, Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersi cives: moris conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui cives suos replet suauitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multis vitium existimant, mors est potius decenda quam vita; Hicerto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, seethat you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all their Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetnesse more then marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus conuerted by others, agreeing in sense but not in words with Saydas: O cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando vniuersum constituit mundum, adiutor vniuersum eius verbum, & Spiritum cuius a comprehendente, miseremini mei: I adiuue the O heauen, thou wise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things, Haue mercy vpon me.

But Saydas hath his inuocation in these words: Obsecro te cælum magni Dei sapiens opus, obsecro te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum omnem mundum firmavit, obsecro te per vniuersum sermonem omnia continens, propitius, propitius esto. I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which hee spake first when hee established all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Iannes and Iambres, and some other that liued about those times.

Here were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Puer thinks in his Commentary vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei. lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had bene heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiarity with Diuels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that feldome came out of his mouth, how-euer by the Septuagint they are called Sophists or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophists, poysoners, and Incantaters: by Hierome, sapientes & malefici; Wise men, and cull doers: and so by Vatablus, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them, magici, workers by drugs. The Geneuean, Sorcerers and Incantaters: Iunius Sapientes, præfignificatores & Magi. Magicians Women here by him are taken in one sense: and Predigatores are such, as dazzle mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorceres appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Diuell changeth himselfe into an Angell of light: and imitateth in all he can the wayes and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names: Opus de Berefish, & opus de mericana: the one they call Sapientiam naturæ, The Wiselome of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis, The Wiselome of diuinity: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pided Lambes in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Ægypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vseth to his glory that gaue them: assuiling to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Saint Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Ægypt, to the death of Ishmael, diuers other famous men liued in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Gracians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were intired Musicall playes to Apollo Delphinus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenesse and scarcity vpon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Dæmons who poyled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erichonius intire the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and began on her Radamantus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules, the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, natue of Argyria City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, onely nurled and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius (sumamed Delphin, famous in Phanicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philoftratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Ægyptian: Manifestum fit, non Thebanum Hercules, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terre (saith Philoftratus.) It is manifest that it was the Ægypt in Hercules, and not the Theban, which traiailed as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy fouer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuariant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge, neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire, the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syrcides calleth Moses the belosed of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Authour) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fauour of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfulness and meeknesse, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembred among prophane Authours; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic: by Megasthenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the flood, remembred by Moses, Eliens, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecateus, Elanius, Ansilus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Esiens, and Sybil haue approued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrology of the Chaldeans was inuented. Iustitius pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Authour) sic Deo gratias fuit, ut diuino precepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitauerit. For his iustice and piety he was speaking vnto God, as by his commandement he came into Phanicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fifth Chapter, speaketh reuerently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authours, which doe confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Sirabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmabat, docebatq; Ægyptios non reitē sentire, qui bestiarum figurarum effigies adhibebant: idcirco solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram q; mare continet, quod cælum & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profectō imaginem, nemo sana mentis, alius eorum rerum, que penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effigies repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Ægyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and castell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that only is God in deede, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call: Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenes of those things, which are among vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Aegyptian wisdome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the Aegyptians; and was mighty in his works and words: the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diadorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Caesariensis, and diuided into four parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish't into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musike, the ancient Aegyptians exceeded all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vnto them: because it consisting of infillible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a lenell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starrs.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musike they made no other account, nor desired further knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to seruice and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripatetick Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starrs haue a certaine fountaine heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper soules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleeueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first original in Aegypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat are offensive; and partly through the fertilitye, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Aegyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mytticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Str. l. 1. Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Aegyptian learning into three euerrall sorts, viz. Epistolary, which is vied in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabetical in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Isis by the Hornes participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropically, and Enigmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropically or transferred, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Aegyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Hornes signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Isis signifieth the Moone: by

by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulnesse: by a Lyon, Fortitude: by a Horfe, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Haired to be vnderstood: Enigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Enigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue bene delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherceides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdom, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Oromopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xenophanes made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same History is with Herodotus a little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trimegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Alepius, hath written so many things of God, worthy of admiration, aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Aegyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authours, to wit, Selenus and Menaeus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not only the Inuentor of the Aegyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wisdome of the Aegyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525. Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Aerall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Aegyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greekes, they seemed to haue bene first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the wisdome of the Aegyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physicke fixe bookes; of the orders of Priests; ten; and of Astrology foure.

6. VIII.

A Briebe of the History of Iosua; and of the space betweene him and Orthoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Ephraim.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdome, tooke on him the gouernment of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Iordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosua rule Saint Augustine dates with the reigne of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argiues; and Erichonius, Athens.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Iordan certaine discouersers to view the cleare and strength of Ierico, the next City vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which he was to passe ouer. Which discouersers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Viding-house, made Iosua know that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach

10f. 2. 11. of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iosua remoued from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew downe his Armie to the banks of the River Jordan, and gaue them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and preference who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Jordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters coming from aboue should stand still in a heape, whereby those below towards the Dead sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

10f. 7. 12. Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Defens of A. rabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already prouided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equitie, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

10f. 4. 10. On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking 20 with them twelve stones from the drie ground in the midst of the Riuer: which, for a memorie of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Jerico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iosua gaue commandement, that all borne in the last fortieth yeere in the Deserts should be circumcised; which ceremonie to that day had bene omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort, That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselves, and a part from all Nations.

10f. 5. 10. On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passouer now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and ha-uening, as it were, sursed on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

10f. 10. 3. And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Iosua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Ruben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Jordan; secondly, by Iosua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fifth yeere of his gouernment; proued in the 14. of Iosua, v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes at Shilo, where Iosua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

10f. 18. The victories of Iosua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his owne books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Storie chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to write themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Gouernours God hath taken away all wisdom and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the inuaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such times Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that warre) ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Iosua. Only Iue (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Ierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Iarmosh, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iosua surpris'd and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vnder ground, were thence by Iosua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also tooke Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iosua possesst himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, delroying the Cities with their Princes.

10 In the end, and when the South Countreies were possesst, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the counter-ailles of necessity, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Iosua di-
10 covered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, heu'd such diligence, as he came on them vnawares; and obtaining absolute victory ouer then, he prosecuted the same to the vttermost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iosua shewed himselfe a skilfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vfed the stratageme of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that hee broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surpris. For he marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Iosua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no distinction, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Aquiuocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Heuites, exprefly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiters, and counterfeits, and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iosua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie; which they auowed to haue bene warme for newnesse when they first set out; their barrels and bottels of wine broken; their shoes patcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iosua hauing sworne vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iosua had it. For first, the commandement which he receiued from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, hee might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there be any euasion from a promise made, whereof the liuing God is called to witnesse. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gaue peace, because hee knew them to be a people hated of God. Hee told them, that if they were of the Heuites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these craftie Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleued what they had said, and consailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and seru'd those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Aposth Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they beleued not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue seru'd himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iosua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not not in this case the helpe of Equiuocation, or Mensall Refutation. For what hee swaie, hee swaie in good Faith; but hee swaie nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuioiable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not as faithlesse mentake it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societe, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societe, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at naught, and desie him. If hee that without Refutation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promitteth in his name, and makes him a witness of the Conuicte made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue bene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a continuing famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to refuse in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made vncertaine, but all the chaines, whereby free men are tied in the world, become slender. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witness, and in whole presence he that taketh the oath hath promised: I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the feuerity of Gods Commandments in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoever hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Agypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadeth, and his Vicegerent, The Soldan Sanar; who being suddenly inuaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syrac to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after hee had made Agypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lye? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amarath the Turke, & when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will say my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of othes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua, but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest access. And those of Juda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azazah, Gath, Ajdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Jordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Machathites: which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Tracomitis.

Nor the Nepthalims possessed themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Bethanah, but they inforst those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlah, Achzib; Heblah, Apheke, and Rehob, nor inforsethem to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahalol, but receiued tribute from them. All the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megiddo; yea Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend aboute foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauids time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eightene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not exprest in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fife and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Massius fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Massius, fourteene: Ioannes Lucidas, seuentene: Caietan, ten: Eusebius giue him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codoman, fife and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliuerie of Israel out of Agypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eightene of them; as finding therest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely; and as I thinke, a well approued opinion.

The same necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Agypt vnto the building of the Temple, conuinceth of error, such as haue inserted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueh his reason in his foure and twentith and last 40 Chapters vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeeres: Buchholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eightene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayles and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battells of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue been meant by the covenant which Iosua made with Israel in Siechem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Caietan and Abulensis: the latter doth likewise coniege that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iusorum, remembred by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered Iosua; The Lord our God will serue, & his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There liued at once with Iofua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed: And about the ſame time the ſittie Daughters of Danauſ (as it is ſaid) ſlew the ſittie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyneus who ſucceeded Danauſ, if the tale be true. There liued alſo with Iofua, Phœnix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iofuaſ life, Iupiter is ſaid to haue rauifhed Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterward married to Aſterius King of Creta) and began on her Minos, Radamanthus and Sarpedon. But S. Auguſtine reports this rauifhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the Troian war. And ſo doth Neflor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theſeus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of ages paſt: Minos being yet more ancient than any of theſe. But hereof elſewhere.

Of the Tribes of Iſrael, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with ſundrie Stories depending upon thoſe places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE ſtorie of the Judges ought to follow that of Iofua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled theſe Tribes, ſhall be remembered when we come to the deſcription of Samarita: but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Story paſt, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderſtanding of both) to make a Geographically deſcription of thoſe Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderſtood, and conceiued. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue beſtowed on euery Tribe his proportion: and doe ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength were by the Iewes obtained: and what numbers it pleaſed God to leaue vnconquered; by whom he might correct and ſcourge them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (ſaith Auguſtine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc ſeculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & miſericorditer temporalem adhibet ſeueritatem, ne æternam iuſte inferat ultionem. The Divine goodneſſe is eſpecially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully uſe temporall ſeuerity, that it may not iuſtly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein deſcribed, I haue added a ſhort Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-wealths: and to helpe my ſelfe herein, I haue peruſed diuers of the beſt Authors vpon this ſubiect: among whom, becauſe I finde ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in ſuch caſes aduentured to follow mine owne reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paſtina of the Philiftines, and the Lands of Og and Sion Kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amoritæ, were but ſmall Prouinces of Syria: it ſhall be neceſſarie, firſt to diuide and bound the generall, and ſo to deſcend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the laſteſt deſcription, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all thoſe Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucogryans, or white Syrians. But taking it ſhorter, ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumea towards the South, Tigriſ towards the Sunne riſing, and the Mediteran Sea Weſtward: it then containeth beſides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Deſert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region alſo which the Greekes call Meſopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuerſ, to wit, Tigriſ and Euphrates, for ſo Araam Nabairajim is expounded: alſo Padan Araam: that is, Ingen Syria, becauſe the two Riuerſ goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edſſa, ſometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many ſmall Prouinces, as Celeſyria which the Latines call Syria Cana, becauſe it lay in that fruitfull Valley betwene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Antiochianus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall ſeat of the Adadeſ, the firſt Kings of Syria. Ad-ioyning to it was the Prouince of Sephene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal: ouer which Adadeſ commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphanices: and laſtly Syria Paſtina bordering Aegypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Iudea alſo a part: and to that Prouince which Moſes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giueth the name of Syria Iudea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this Land.

THAT Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and ſtretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deſert betwene Idumea and Aegypt: bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the Weſt, and the Mountaines of Hermion, Galaad and Arnon towards the Eaſt: the ſame Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Tracônitis, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Sonne of Cham, & lingua appellata ſuit Canaan: The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus: and after Hebreæ of the Hebrewes: who tooke name from Heber, the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Auguſtine. But Arias Montanus not ſo well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all thoſe of Noahs Sonnes, which paſt ouer Euphrates towards the Weſt Sea. For the word Heber, ſaith he, is as much as transiens or transmittens, of going or paſſing over. And becauſe the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Aegyptians called Hebrai, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Iudea from Iuda; and then afterwards intuled The holy Land, becauſe therein our Sauour Chriſt was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure; namely, into Edom, (otherwiſe Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samarita, and Iudea. Galilee is double, the ſuperior called Genetium, and the inferior: and that Galilee and Iudea are diſtinguiſhed, it is plaine in the Euangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now beſides theſe prouinces of Phœnicia, and Paſtina (both which the Riuer of Jordan boundeth; being that Phœnicia ſtretcheth a little more Eaſterly towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the Eaſt of Jordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermion, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of haſie Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo: aſwell becauſe anciently poſſeſt by the Amoritæ, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Iſraelites, which Eaſtermoſt parts are againe diuided into Baſan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Armon, and the Territories of the Maſchati, Geſſuri, Argobæ, Huæ. They are knownto the latter Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Tracônitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeake in their proper places.

But where Moſes deſcribeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genetiſ, hee maketh mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, for theſe be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou commeſt to Gerar vntill Azab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboim, euen vnto Laſbi: by which words Moſes ſetteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediteran. But in Deuteronomie it ſeemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places whereon the ſole of your feet ſhall tread, ſhall be yours: Deut. 1. 21.

your coast shall be from the wilderness and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Aszrah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petraea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer posside, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by los these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true that David greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holie Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babilonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreies giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow: but therein else where to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods they themselves also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heauens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Vcrises preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other then all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the cleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and gain, and possess the Land, whither ye goe to possess it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swore vnto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were above the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, faith hee, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that ye, so loue the Lord, your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maiestie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, faith hee, ostendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; He sheweth that his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrow the reputation of the Iewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vniuersum terram qua in caelo est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quotiam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut cit longitudine beat 160. miliarium, latitudine vero 40. & in his citiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nungquam a Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce bath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possessed, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo dicimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina Regione petendam: quae totius Prouinciae deterrima est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & penuriam pasturum sitis: ita ut celestibus vltatur pluujs; & rarissimis fontium cisternarum structurae solatur: sed in Dei manibus ad quam dicitur, scissinauerunt fructus eius; From whence, faith hee, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Prouince, & rugged with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of the first: so as it preferreth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cisternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suggestatione terra Iudeae, et Hereticus Sycephanta mentitur: aut quo auferam bistorie veritatem: quae fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis, sed ut decus supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagogam angustias latitudinis Ecclesie preferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificant: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neque (faith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudas (as the Hereticall Sycephanta doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spirituall vnder it aniding, but to beat down the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagoge farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honnie.

By this it may also be gathered, howlooser it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense, that Euphrates or Perah, which is made the East bound, should be taken onely in a spirituall sense) yet neuertheless that Hieromes opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perah were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephthaim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined others vowels then now the Hebrew editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

The Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai; all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolemais, along the Sea-coast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border sometwelue miles: though Ant. 116. Ant. 116. makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his bread shall be fat, And he shall giue pleasures for a King.

Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidon. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosus, and Iosephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosus's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Assyrians, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wath of the Phenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphas: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, faith Seiglerus: but Plinius makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Welfinburg in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

Where Kings it had till Agenor's time: there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonius, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient then Tyre, which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principal workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Cyder: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Aegypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sophyra, Cities of Beotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie give the Zidonians the inuention of Glasse, which they vied to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, as it seems, because thereof necere Psolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artificis vitri: Zidon vitrarioris officinis Nobilis: Zidon a famous Glassmaker, or a skillfull workman in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan, as Phidias the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomon's Idolatrie: where Astaroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals & diuers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plurall names of Baals: some of them and Astartes, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astartes, as I am informed to haue beene a shepheard, med by a skillfull Hebrician, is plural: the singular being Astarte: whence Iud. 2. 23. the word Septuagint reads iniquos in Astarte. They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diueritie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the diuers stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quest. 12. in Iud. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Oftrum Sarra, by which name Iouenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day: the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet ueneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Aegyptian Idolatry, as with the Gracians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Aegyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Saviour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyris and Zidon, they had repented long agoe &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyris and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Normanes, who came with a Fleete to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brieue History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gazeta, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Postellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Punica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Præstis antiqua fuit, Tyrijs tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In 50 Spain they founded Gades, now Cadiz. In Balie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos. *A. 2. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iulime deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iofua, and Ioseph witnesse, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iofua's time, as neither did him selfe attempt it, neither could the Aserites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably gouerned, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wall of the Phenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betweene it and Tyre, the distance betweene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weistunbur in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betweene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient then Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. Foras much as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zerobabel their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: as the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wile Zidonians, The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle: hath on the South side by the Port of Aegypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside as combustion: that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephrya, Cities of Bacotia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vied to make of those sands which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Ptolomais or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Murano: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon infamis artificis vitri: Zidon vitrariorum officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites;) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan as Plinie and Astarte out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Iud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomon, who had the same Idols: where Astarte is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal, Diuers Baals & diuers Astartes. The forme of Astarte in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plurall names of Baal, Astarte, Ishtar, and Astarte, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astarte, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebrician, is plural: the singular being Astarte: whence Iud. 2. 13. the Septuagint reader in agnitione sua accipit: They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vsed to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augulime quest. 19. in Iud. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For as for the Carthaginians (which were Tyrans) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte. Tullius, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom hee makes to be borne of Tyrrus and Syria, and to haue bene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius, 2. Satur. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great eneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their fongs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Aegyptian Idolatry, as with the Gracians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride: that Osiris with the Aegyptians is called Ammon: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Saviour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great workes which were done in thee, had bene done in Tyrrus and Zidon, they had repented long ago. &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyrrus and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Normans, who came with a Fleete to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandment thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

30 Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next Citie Southward from Zidon, betweene it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons horiorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a Citie very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Qua, Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

40 I haue no wine of Gazza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This Citie had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, faith Possellus.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous Citie of Tyre, whose fleets of stipes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrans erected Vica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbis antiqua fuit, Tyrry tenuere Coloni, Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phoenicum, a Colony of the Phenicians. In 50 Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos A. Plin. lib. 5. c. 13. Chili, which Citie the Scholias of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bi. Marcelin. lib. 2. c. 13.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iofua the 19. taking name from the situation; because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra: for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ofrum Sarraenum, by which name Lucretius and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay

Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon; which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thir as the sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Thir as the sonne of Iaphet set himselfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to periwade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius; and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this City elder than Sidon: Isidore the Monks Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrrus the wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the middle of the Sea, as some reade, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manufecture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony: but this availed not. For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied he, as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often waht away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their Wallles, he ouertopt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent mouing Spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which he caused 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood he performed (as some Authours affirme) vpon the iusses of those slaues which had formerly slaine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Princiuall Gouvernour, which Darius feared in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gerezim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Jewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Jewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Gull. Tyrrus calleth Sanabala, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanassar the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three score shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve saile scattered that fleet, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants five yeeres, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Euphratus, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annals of the Egyptians (which the faide Menander conuerted into Greece) adding, that Eulaleus, whom Tyrrus calleth Heliuseus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the same fixe and twenty yeeres. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeede gaue to Nabuchodonosor the example of that despairfull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the 10 same cawly and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did the Babylonians continue before it, as every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of shippes, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthned this resolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaue not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Seruants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians haue 30 not bene silent. For both Diodorus, and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

After these two great Pastusions by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it selfe againe; and continued in great glory about 300. yeeres, vnto the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierusalem onely, who within his owne Diocesse and foureteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwile Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Caesarea, Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Torisfa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered with the other Palestine Cities 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venicians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subiected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army and late downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of shippes and Gallies from Antaradus into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and braketh the Saracens fleet, and sallying out resolutely vpon his armie, slew great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a River vnfordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cabebral Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble; 940. yeeres before before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hacipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Aegyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Macc. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously writt from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the faide Ptolomie not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabaeus treacherously surprized and slaine, as it is 1 Macc. 12. 48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforefaide Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomaeus ioynd, ouerthrowne & treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomie: who enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason about three dayes, for God stricke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seat: two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safety and capacity inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middle of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flics, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called pharus in Aegypt: to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came nere and sought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haamarius the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Cenais: to whom a third of the reuenew was giuen in recompence. Again, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourecore and feuen, Saladine King of Aegypt, and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vterly demolished: though in some fort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne belief: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driuen to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to haue bene in the fields of Libanus: betweene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these:

In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesiastico modum fuit edificata: In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and huius killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her parent. In memory of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodouicus Roman. Patrie. Nauigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorically, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of Georgethe Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

Of Acciza, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acciza, or Achazib, which Saint Hierome calleth Achzaph, and Iosephus Ecdippus, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acciza and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauailed as farre to the North as Reob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Hadarbeser, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and chap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzaph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbab, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling downe, flew seuen and twenty thousand of *Benhadad*s Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abab. Here Iunius finds that the Philistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue bene in Iuda. Of which Iof. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others conuert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandaliu of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acciza and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he undertooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of liuing Waters: from whence not onely all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to trauaile till it recover the Sea, driueth fixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Cam. 4.

Tim. 1.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acciza, and Sandalium, Randeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achzaph, or Acab, or after Saint Hierome Aijapa: a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iofsa, at the waters of Merom.

Iof. 12. 200

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Farther into the Land towards Iordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hillles of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the third, King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried: There were fixe Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: where whereof foure are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lamperts, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort: The first neere the Sea vnder the Hill of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Teutonic, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens posselt the best part of the vpper Galilee) the chiefe of which Order was in Peolomais Acon. The first Fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Ios. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine King of Syria and Aegypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulced.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlah) which Saint Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rehob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod, surnamed the Afcanite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua displicere significat (saith Wesphenburg) to called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those promitions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others thinke this Chabul or Cabal, containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to haue bene without the compasse of the holy Land: though bordering Affer on the North-side: as it is saide, *1 Reg. 9.
11.* that they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Coun-treys: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howlocuer, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rehobee, whose City Roob, or Rehob, was in these parts.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gisala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Jordan: Gisala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Leni, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Thecues, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudaea: by whose practise Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all he could the City of Gisala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarmes, to surprize it: who at the same time for it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward reded to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Maior, and * Cades, (or Cedessa) of the first was that Syro-phœnician, whose Daughter Christ deliuered of the euill Spirit. Neere the other, they say, it was that Ionathas Machabees ouerthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, diuers others: as on the South border, and neere the Sea, Messall or Misbeal: within the Land * Beja, Bethadon, and Beibemec, standing on the South border betwene Affer and Zabulon: on the North side ioyning to Syro-phœnicia, is the City of Hebhalon, or Chethlon, the vnmort of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then * Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued: there are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammom, of which *Ios.
19. 28.* where also we read of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rehob, and Misbeal, which wee haue already mentioned, were by the Afferites giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Judges 1. 30. to which out of Iosua wee may adde Ebron, Amnah, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Riuers and Mountaines of Affer.

THE Riuers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler ioy-neth Lycus, Polomie, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus: which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Polomie doth, betwene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called fos hortorum Libani. Aff. Tab. 4.
bani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleutherus: for which hee also citeth 10 Plinie, and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Polomie: and therefore Pmetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus Ve- lana: which Riuer boundeth Phœnicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeeth: for but this principall Riuer of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus. Christians Schrot out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laestian (which Laestian in this our age both viewed and describ'd the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the freemes which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be.
There is also another Riuer d-scribed by Adrichome, named Iepthael, which I finde in no 20 other Authour, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Iosua, but the word Ghe which is added there to Iepthael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneca, and Arias Montanus turneit. There is also found in Affer, the Riuer of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith * Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidonians practised: and now the Venicians at Murana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Cheidamin, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cende- nia, as all Cosmographers both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Travellers into those parts witnesseth. It is true that the Riuer of Chislon taketh water from Cheidamin: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath describ'd it: neither doth it find the Sea at Peolomais, 30 Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South betwene Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesseth Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Riuers there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of huing waters adioyning to Tyre: and * Maseroph, or after Saint Hierome, Maserophotracim, of the whole Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by feeding the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlesyria: two great ledges of Hillies, which from the Sea of Phœni- cia and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundred stadia of furlongs according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Cœlesyria: which 40 those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the VVest (where they begin at Theiopsophon, or Desfacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Ara- bia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they beginato part Tracônitis and Balan from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermom: which Mases also nameth Sien, the Phœnicians Syrian, and the Amorites Samir, neither is this any one Mountaine apart, but a continuation of Hillies: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Eliemy proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hillies of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Tracônitis: and Plinie by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti- 50 libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer, the Hebrew word Libanus (saith Wesphenburg) significeth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those Trees yeeld: because Libanus is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphraidesius affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kinde of hony dew, which is by the Syrians congealed into hard fugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

F f

The

Of Dicaeſia, nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Panetas, and so recalled it, with the Territory adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Chriſt healed of a bloody iſſue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a conſtant Faith: who afterward, as ſhee was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodneſſe, and no leſſe gratefull for the fame, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, cauſed two Statues to be caſt in pure Copper: the one repreſenting Chriſt, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her ſelfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding vp her hands towards him. Theſe three mounted vpon two great Baſes or Pedeſtals of the ſame Metall, which ſhee placed by a Fountaine neere her owne Houſe: both which (ſaith Eusebius) remained in their firſt perfection, euen to his owne time: which himſelfe had ſcene, who lived in the Reigne of Conſtantine the Great. But in the yeere after Chriſt 353. that Mon-ſter Julian Apoſtata, cauſed that worthy Monument to be caſt downe, and deſaced: ſetting up the like of his owne in the ſame place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into ſifters: the head, body, and other parts, ſundered and ſcattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is alſo confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminus in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of thoſe two Riues in a ſhoyle exceeding fruitfull, and pleaſant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place, in which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was ſaid that Saint Peter acknowledged Chriſt to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was ſworn, Tu es Petrus, & ſuper hanc petram, &c. After this City receiued the Chriſtian faith, it was honoured with a Biſhops ſeate: and it ranne the ſame fortune with the reſt, ſort was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Chriſtians: vnder Euleh the fourth King of Etiopus, and after the death of Goffry of Bullion, the King of Damaſcus wreſted from the Chriſtians; and ſhortly after by them againe it was recovered. Laſtly, now remaineth with all that part of the World ſubiected to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the leaſt: ſo often remembered by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Chriſts preſence three yeeres: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he firſt preached and taught the Doctrine of our ſaluation: according to that notable Prophecy of Eſay 9. The people that walked in darkneſſe, haue ſeene a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the ſhadow of death, vpon them hath the light ſhined.

Capernaum was ſeated on Iordan, euen where it encreth into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich ſhoyle: of whoſe deſtruction Chriſt himſelfe prophecied in theſe words, And thou Capernaum which art ſituated vpon heauen, ſhalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which ſhewed the pride and greatneſſe of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were ſome maries of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himſelfe confeſſeth: it being then a reaſonable Burge or Towne: yet thoſe that haue ſince, and long ſince ſcene it, as Brocard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac affirme, that it then conſiſted but of fix poore Fithers houſes.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapoliſ or Decapolis, is in this deſcription often mentioned, and in Saint Matthew, Marke and Luke, alſo remembered; but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and ſo Plinie himſelfe confeſſeth; for Marius Niger ſpeaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Cafius in Cafſotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which deſcription it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Celeſyria, all Paleſtina, and Iudea.

Plinie alſo makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbeth four of them to be ſituated towards Arabia: to wit, firſt theſe three, Damaſcus, Opetus, Raphana, then Philadelphus (which was firſt called Amana, ſaith Stephanus, or as Ignele Amoma rather, becauſe it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Ptole. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, ſometimes ſometimes Niſa, built (as is ſaide) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurſe, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethſan; for the ſixth he ſetteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Celeſyria, which was alſo called Antioch and Selencia: but is Gadara in Baſan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, ſeated on an high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromax. This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manaſſeh ouer Jordan: but he miſtaketh it; for Hieromax falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betwene Hippus and Geraſa, whereas Iaboc encreth the ſame Sea betwene Ephron and Phanuel. For the ſeuenth he nameth * Hippus, or Hippion, a City ſo called of a Colonie of Horſemen there gathered by Herod, on the Eaſt ſide of the Galilean Sea, deſcribed hereafter in the Tribe of Manaſſeh ouer Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is alſo called Buris, and Berenice, ſeated in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelaſa, which Iſeppus takes to be Geraſa: and Geraſa is found in Celeſyria by Iſeppus, Hegeſippus, and Stephanus: but by Plinie (whom I rather follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and laſt, Plinie nameth Canatha, and ſo doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calles Gamala, but Hegeſippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Baſan ouer Jordan, ſo called becauſe thoſe ten Hillies on which it is ſeated, haue the ſhape of a Camell. But the collection of theſe ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brocard, Breidenbech, and Saliniac, which makes them to be theſe, Ceſarea Philippi, and Afor, before remembered, Cede, Nephthalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethſaida, Joſopata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethſan. For all other Authours diſagree herein, and giue no reaſon for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Matthew makes it manifeſt, that this Region called Decapoliſ, was all that Tract betwene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coaſts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the miſt of the coaſts of Decapoliſ: ſo that it was bounded by Damaſcus and Libanus on the North: by the Phenician Sea, betwene Zidon and Ptolemais on the Weſt: by the Hillies of Gelbo and Bethſan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwiſe Hermom, Sanir, and Galaad, on the Eaſt: which is from Eaſt to Weſt the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the ſame diſtance which may be each way forty Engliſh miles.

†. V.

Of Hamath.

But to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is ſeated neere the foote thereof of the City of * Hamath or Chammath, of which (as they ſay) the Countrey adjoining taketh name: the ſame which Iſeppus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: a Iacobus Emath, Zeigler, Iurae, Iurae Regio cetera borealis tribus Nephthalim, per montem Libanus & g. Trachones. The Countrey of Iurae, ſaith he, containeth the North parts of the 40 Tribe of Nephthalim, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calles Trachonitis Iurae, he miſtakes the ſeate of this Region: and ſo doth Mercator. For indeede were Iurae (which Hegeſippus calles Perea, and G. Tyrim, Baccar) the ſame with Tracomis, yet Tracomis is ſelfe ſo farre more to the Eaſt than Hamath in Nephthalim: for Tracomis lieth betwene Ceſarea Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hamath or Chammath is ſeated vnder Ceſarea, towards the Sea Weſtward. And it ſeemeth that this miſtaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Celeſyria, beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which Hierome vpon Amos calles Antiochia, with 50 Hamath or Hamath the leſſer in Phoenicia, and Nephthalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hamath, or in our Tranſlation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is ſet farre from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is remembered in Numbers 34. verſe 8. and Numbers 13. verſe 22. and in Eſekiel 47. 16. In the firſt of which places it bordereth the Land of promiſe, theſe being the words: From Mount Ebor you ſhall point (that is, direct or draw a line) vntill it come to Hamath: in b So Hierome in his Comment in Amos, c. 6. v. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the great, as it ſeemes, for diſtinction from the other in Nephthalim, though Matt. Berolius receiuing Hierome, rather follow the opinion of Zeigler or Amos mentioned, as indeede it cannot eaſily be ſubſiſted, that either one or other of theſe is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the ſame City which Iſeppus 19. 31. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthalim, was alſo called Hamath (whence the word Hamath & Emath, were ſprung) it may be gathered partly becauſe the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for diſtinction is called Chammath Epiphania, as this (as it may ſeeme by Iſeppus 19. 31.) was Chammath Dura.

and Chamath Iuda, as we have noted, 2 Reg. 24. Secondly, because Nun 3. 4. and also Ezekiel 47. 10. Chamath in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too neere the West comes, to be the Chamath Ybela: for in the line which should make the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Maser to name neere a place Eastward along the breadth of the holy Land, & vntill we come to Herman (for so they expound Mount Hir, Nun 3. 4. 7.) and beyond Herman Eastward in this North side, they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chamath, then Tifad, then Ziphon, and lastly, Chasip, being, a thing most vailly: seeing Israell had little or nothing Eastward beyond Herman. Therefore we must needs expound Hir to be one of the Hills neere Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Asper, Nephthaim, and Herman, and in like manner those in Beniet: first Chasip, then Chamath, and so in order, Berith, Sibrim, Tifad, Chasip, Chasip, Chasip, Chasip. c Of which Reb, 35. d Which Reb, or Reb, in Iofua 19. 28. is placed in Asper towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthaim.

which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of Reb adioyning prouie it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre removed and beyond the forenamed mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israell euer had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituraea, witnesse Stella and Latician; and not that in Nephthaim, where Jonathas Macchabeus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

For though Tracomitis be comprehended within Ituraea (and therefore it is saide to be Tricomitis Galilee Gentium) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountains Tracomis, and so it stretcheth into the plains of the Territory of Ituraea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President both of Ituraea and Tracomitis: both which are ouer Iordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephthaim, is on the West side of Iordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Country Ituraea was so called of Itur one of the sonnes of Israell; it is placed in properly belongeth to the bounds of Calefryria and Arabia the Desert. The people Ituri were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom

* That is doth properly belongeth to Arabia, the name of Itur Ituraea (sonne, Vir il: whose issue settled in the Arabians, may in part give witnesse. Also the place of the i Chro. 5. 39. confirms it where Itur is named among the Agarenes, against the Eumaites & Gadites made war, & whose country they possessed in the time of Terabon, as their fore-fathers had done in the time of Saul after his conquest of the Amalekites, Chro. 1. 1. Israell.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephthaim seemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Ituraea, both built by Amathus the eleuenth son of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hamath in Nephthaim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subugation Tobu reioyced, because Hadafer whom the Damasceni came to helpe, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brasse.

But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successe would not haue had peace with Tobu, if he had bene King of any place in Nephthaim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tifad: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise) allotted by God to the children of Israell.

But this Hamath of Nephthaim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath bene saide, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amath, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

¶ VI.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

In the border of Hamath or Emath towards Iordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Billa, watered from the fountaine Daphni: which falleth into the lake of Merom. Heere Chano was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Tericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekias's infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which feldome-exempld calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Hierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

There are besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthaim, as that which is called Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in Isachar, another in Iuda, of which Iof. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of Nephthaim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Iof. 20. 7. Kede in Galilee in mente Nephthai: Iosephus calls it Cedes, and in Saint Hierome's time it was called Cidius. Belfors greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desert of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iofua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne; who overthroweth the Armie of the second Tabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possit by Teglatphalser, when he waited all Nephthaim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapoli Region: When it had embraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zepet, which was also one of the ten Decapoli Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritima neere it. Touching Rama of Nephthaim, seated Northward neere Sephet: this is to be noted; that there are diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situated on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebrais excelsum, Ramah with the Hebreus is high). Also that from this Rama Iof. 19. 26. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Towns) to be a part of the words: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place Bethfemes, of which Iof. 19. 28. which defended it selfe against Nephthaim, Iud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephthalims.

Adioyning to which standeth Cartham or Kiriathaim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountain out of which the springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the Euangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magdalea, a place of strength, and Mesaloth of which we reade that it was forced by Baruchides in the time of the Macchabees: also (according to Adri- chomius) one of the two Beriths of Nephthaim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weakie coniecture out of Ioseph. anti. 1. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom; because the Kings that ioyned with Tabin against Iofua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Iof. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the 50 Citie Beritha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beritha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the upper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Beritha neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahachab we haue spoken already) this he Isidorus in Reu- doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2. Sam. 20. 14. where some reade Abel by Beth- Abela, et omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, et omnes Berim, that is, with all the dem com Berim: for Shebath being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beritha or Bereth) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beritha of Nephthaim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembered by Ezek.

streame Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another streame Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorfeus by Cesaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum, which Torrent they call Dotham, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephtahel, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

IHenext adioyning Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered to the Holy Land, 64300.

Tarichea in Sueton.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more; a Citie wherein the Iewes (by the practice of a certaine mutinous vsptart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouvernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Iewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Iewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the riuers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cestion, or Cistion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings 6. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a Citie of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboe take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezrah, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeigler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Apheer, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betwene which and Sunah, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Regals assisting Benhadad, incurred Acab: and were overthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness boast himselfe, as he hath puteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian viterly broken and discomfited by Acab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which overthrow the seruants and Counsaillors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should overcome them.

Vnder Apheer towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrulon, in the plaines of Galilee, so called also the great field of Esdrulon, and Magedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Apheer to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casaloath, of which, 1. Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seefima or Shabasfima, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoast, there is found the Caste of Pilgrimes: a strong Caste inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-houle and Magasin of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolouse.

From the Caste of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthest farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies not at leisure, or perchance a-sleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessels of water thereon: by which miracle the people increased, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adioyning.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caphas, built, as they say, by Caphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porfima and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the banks of Chifon, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Apharaim, and the Castles of Mera, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widowers onely sonne.

Luc. 7.

Then Seon or Shion named Ios. 19. betwene the two Hills of Herman, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchantresse that vndertook to raise vp the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Ios. 6. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath as it is named, Ios. 2. 28. or Dobrath, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which stretcheth it selfe over Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Thecues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Herman, and on the other to the Valley of Israhel: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboe on the South, and by Herman, and the River Chifon on the North. In these plaines Gedeon ouerthrew the Madianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Acab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

IHenext Tribewhich ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleuenth sonne of Iacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Puaphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Iacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sonnes of Iacob, and made vp the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entered of their issues, 32700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Israhel on the North, and Machmas is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the lesse, and pierced into the South, to the vttermost of Calasyria, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians given by the Greces.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Iewes to fight against their owne Nation

Apollonia: though Ptolomie sets Apollonia elsewhere, & toward Egypt, between this City and Ioppe, to which Epifan gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herode built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke over the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee forced a Harborow of great capacite, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea the Marchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their cables and Anchors. This worke he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetched from farre, and the weight of the stones was such as it exceedeth belief, I have added Iosephus owne words

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelasius to haubeme Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was heerein two yeres prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cesar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a God by his flatteries, hee was thicken with an Angell unto death, saith Iohannes.

To the North of Cafaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read: Iof. 1. 2. foiled (faith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Iofas. But Iunius for in Naphoth Dor, reads in trabidus Dor: and for the Vulgar, in negidius Dor; although 1. Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iofas call it Nephthi-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Iof. 12. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of the twelue Principalities or Sitarches, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon *Maceab. 15. 11.*⁴⁰ placeth it betwene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the Riuer Chersenus: for so some name the Riuer Chorfas, of which we haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where hee was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villain that receiued 200.talents for the ranfome of Ionathan Maccabaeus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him flew his owne Maister, vsurping for a while the Kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Dioceffe of Caesaria.

From Cafaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Gilgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Evangelists, they finde in these parts neere the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgol or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whole King was slaine by Iofua.

Then Antipatris is called Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Machabees it was called Capharjalama: in the fields whereof Judas Machabees overthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Judas by a traitorous Jew, called Alimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Bacchides, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, concluded conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Leues. In after-times the Armie of Godfrey of Bullion attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldovine. It was honoured in thole daies with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Affur, faith Brochard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Iomas was three daies preferred in a Whale.

In the bodie of a Whale.

In the Land, from Antipatris and Cesaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestus the Romane waisted with fire and sword, because the Jewes which dwelved at Cesaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere unto it is the Mountaine of Abdin, the Steward of King Achab: wherein hee hid an hundred Prophets, and fedde them, after which he himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

6. I.

20 The bounds and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these five Tribes, of Asher, Nephthim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, possit the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phenicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a brieue of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and 30 in so many changes of Estates and Conquests of Heauenly Princes, haue bene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertaine: but the Cafuzers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casios, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthofia, to the North of Tripolis. Scotoma makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Euphrates, she fills into the Sea at the Land of Aradas, somewhat to the North of Orthofia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranea, as far as the River of Cleueus, which seems to be that which the Iewes call the Tormen or River of 40 Magedo. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Toppe within it: Corvinus and Bu- Plin. lib. 5. c. 19 deus, Toppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) que nunc Palaestina Sy-riæ dicitur. It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palaestina of Syria.

Seraboe comprehends in this Country of Ptoemicia, all the Sea side of Tuscia, and P.z-leina, curvum Pelufium, the first Port of Agypt. On the contrary Dioscorus Siculus foldeth it up in Caletyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolemies description, who was seldom deccied in his owne Art. It had in it these famous Marinimatic Cities (besides all those of the Ilands) to wit, Aradas, Chorbusa, Tripolis, Batrys, Hyblus, Erytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomae (or Acon) Dora, and Caletyria Palestine: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it accordingly commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same fate continuing euen vnto Iosias time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region: afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of Pandallwarres. But in proceesse of time the Citie of Tyre adioyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

But whatsoever remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachonias, Manias, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Iofua, to whom succeeded Phanix; of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phanix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phaïs governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremie time, and while Seidaim ruled in India, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie breakeeth of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, & Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleete, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Regals, and petty Kings in Hieremie time, they were subdued by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophced.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successer, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Grecians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betwene Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130. yeeres and somewhat more betwene Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curcius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their viter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Albenicus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women, dancers, and singers: whom hee to this end chiefly inuited, and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and finely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hieremie and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were near him with an Armie too wayghty for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driuen thence, He gaue the Kingdom to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curcius calls Abdolominus, Iustine Abdolominus, and Plutarch Alonymus: who at the very house that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting hearbs and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwife a wise man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocratall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Afer.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Iosephus and Theophilus remember: whom Iosephus calls Abmalus; the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Saron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eusepius) constrained this Saron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psalm 83.

Hiram succeeded Saron, whom Iosephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometime Hieropus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Masons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not onely furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also he ioynd with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: & lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3^d.

10. booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: & gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Astarte, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Balesartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Balesartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 30. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeere, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdom 12. yeeres.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus, recouered the Kingdom from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Balesartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Atharimus, and reigned 8. moneths; liued 50. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Iubobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Astarimus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddess Astarte, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the same which in the first Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Iezabel, Astarte chab married.

Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, & reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seventh yeere of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be sette out of square. For Pygmalion courteous of Sichus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traiterously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barce in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Seruius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts, others from Iedidia, a surname of Salomon.

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion: and reigned 36. yeeres: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmanaſſar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writteth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Judges, succeeding each other: 10 First, by Embalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and odd months: after whom Balastorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres: after him from sentence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumians inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

IF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who only is vntchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the sayde Bozius, enforcing heere-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumians, descended from Eſau, *Iacob*s brother: first, it can hardly be beleueed that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in aie for truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooue which the Scriptures giue of *Hiram*s good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniecturall arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Eſau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumians, he endeouours to shew, partly by weakere reasons, painefully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, & others witnesse, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyros, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumians: as Elah and Eſiongaber, or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whose cheefe City was Madian, so called of Madian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Heereunto he addeth, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Aſturtis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the idolatrous customes of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumians, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphaz the Temanite, who dispuerd with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozius, who labouring to proue one Paradox by another, deferues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumians, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumians at all. In what Religion Eſau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plain termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when Dauid & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knows not: or who is ignorant rant of *Dauid*s vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued: Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyros & Mount Ser, which Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid: euen then when Iob flew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wildome of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumians punished for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeede the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumia, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hier, the Country of Iob: and so to Sach the City of Bildad the Sabite, as both such Chorographers who best know those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wildome, all the people of the East; nor the inhabitants of Mount Ser, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphaz the sonne of Eſau had a sonne called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a son called Teman: of whom it is not unlike that Teman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And hee w^t considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleuee that such a people were descended from one of *Eſau*s his grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue beene: if one Tribe of them, yea one Family of a Tribe had bene so great: surely Mount Ser and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec: or assisted the Amalekites: when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being sent to Abraham by Cethura, doubtles was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seignory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozius imagines the Edumians to haue held: if the Edumites in after-times held some places as Elan and Eſiongaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in *Mos*s time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For *Mos*s himselfe saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian flood, *Mos*s must needs haue known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But coniecturall Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozius himselfe confesseth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Israel, Ief. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed bee God that hath sent King Dauid a wife sonne: we cannot inferre that he was of *Dauid*s Religion. The Turke hath saydes much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Aſtareth; and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiving therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, he allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered: being otherwise apt to yeelde silkes: as the Andarim silkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Salomon was the wiser, who hauing got the gold first gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was an necessary policy which enforced Tyros to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates: thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, so their flects on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyros: so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peaceto employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozins frames negatively vpon particular to examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think no man knowes. It seems to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples. Euery saluage Nation hath some wisdom excellen the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Phicia, Leptis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue beene, for they tradid in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would haue vs thinke them to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styeth men of contrary opinion impoliticos, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozins would be better haue agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neere vnto the true Religion: what may be saide of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honor to one of their olde Gods: yea, what one Nation, saue only that of the Iewes, was subdurd by them, whose Gods they did not afterward enterrage in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiectd, vbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were unworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lowd and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vied against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozins, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashiond in their owne braines any strange Chimeras of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitty is it, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselues cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. 1.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

20 phraim by the North and South; as Jordan, and the Mediterranean Sea, did by the East and West.

Auging now past ouer Phanicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose yfices when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Ioseph excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Jordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded E-

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amris or Homri King thereof, and seated on the toppes of the Mountaine Samron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Seacoast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Caesar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building, for as Bruchard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Bruchard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hevrne and 30 carued stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Here were the Prophets Heliseus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelosa, and Napolsa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Leui, in reuenge of the raiishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the foyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirbathon on the Mountaine Amale, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Iudas Machabees ouerthrew Saron and Lysias, Licutenants to Antiochus. This City had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betwene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iofa: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Sarona is not particularly giuen to this Valley, butto euery fruitfull plaine Region; for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Cesarea and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Taber and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esaie, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, reade Saron for Asaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diophysol, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Indea, the first in dignity (for the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cutt off Amas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Sarona. This Ioppe is the same as Jaffa.

was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rauens and Spoyle of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most saluage and barbarous Nations.

Of this Saint George see more above in this 2 booke. C. 7. §. 3. & 5.

In Diopolis (saith will of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused afaire Church to be built over his Tombe, these be Tyrinus his words: Relicta ad exervi locis maritimis Antipatride, & Ioppe, per late patrem plantium Elutberiam pertransiunt, Liddam que est Diopolis, ubi & egregij Martyris Georgij scilicet bodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, perueniunt, eius Ecclesiam quoniam ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pium & orthodoxum Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Iustinianus multo studio & deuotione prompta edificari precepit, &c. They hauing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatris, and Ioppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Elutberia, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Goaly & Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iustinian had commanded to bee built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrinus, by whose testimony, we may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria, but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yettall so it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports; who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yett he adde, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name liues in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrinus aboue cited, withnesse to haue bene buried at Lidda, or Diopolis. The same also is confirmed by Victori. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Sam. 1. 2. f. v. 5.

Neere to Lidda or Diopolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Pama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama, one they set in the Tribe of Iuda neere Thebus in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthalim, not far from Sebeth; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North alongst the coast are Holon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of 40 which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Bell. Ind. 1. 6. Ierues. Also Balsafusa (for which Iunius 2. Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Shaltis) they place her about in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Shaltis, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofna, one of the Teparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-sara, or according to the Hebrew Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Teparchies or Presidencies of Iuda, which they call Thamnathica; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gas; which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and ouer it the Summe engrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Iosua time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Iudas Maccabew with 3000. Iewes ouerthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gas or Gerzer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharao of Agypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed, Salomon re-built it.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Iefeth, of which Iof. 16. 3. otherwise Peleti, whence David had part of his Pratorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benai. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeeres, till the Philistins got it.

To this they ioyn the Citie of Michmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabew inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Natioh where Saul prophesied; and neere it Ephraim, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Kibthim, of the Leuites, of which Iosua 2. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmetham, of which 1. Chro. 6. 28. As for Abisalom Basaleph, which they finde here about, Iunius reads it in the Plaine of Chazor; and findes it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Iof. 15. we read of two Chazors in that Tribe; one neere Keddeh, v. 23. and the other the same as Chetron, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it kernes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus Ind. 9. 10. 6. Millo reads incola munitionis, and for Salomo edificabit Mello, he reads edificabit munitionem, and so the Septuagint reads in idem in that place. And without doubt the Millo Parablon which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua, leuen publicum and lanuch or Linach spoiled by Teglatphalassar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Iordan: severall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gabas, Ind. 2. 9. * the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon, Ind. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tuph or Tophim, Ind. 9. 5. where Rama-Tophim stood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the fides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Isaiah in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49. 22. compared Iosephs two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitfull Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her, Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegorie also Ezekiel, c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) proferres: as also in his Lamentation for Iuda, he followeth the other Allegorie of Isaiah, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouerlooketh all the plaines on both fides of Iordan, they finde the Cattle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Ioseph 1. Bell. Ind. 4. 2. in which Cattle as it is, 1. Macc. 16. Ptolomie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabew his Father in Law.

Among the Riuers of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gas, remembered in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reads Hiddai ex vna vallium Gabasi: yett the Vulgar and Arabian reads Giddai of the Riuier of Gas. Also in this Tribe they placeth the Riuier of Capthi, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great droughth, where he was fed with the Rauens: and after that the Riuier was dried vp, he traualled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieued by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby he sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

For the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and referue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the diuision from Iuda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of strength & courage, was by Salomon made ouer-see of the buildings of the Muration in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manasse: & so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from salem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that hee was by God destined to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Ochores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of David, and his Captaine Iothab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; vying both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Israel; that himselfe might the easier spoile it, as he did: for in the fift yeere of Rehoboam, Shishak sackt the Citie of Hiersusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Salomon, and all the spoiles which David tooke from Adadenezzer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Elamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hiersusalem to doe their vsuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Idumean Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Iael: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Juda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Juda: he seated himselfe in Thersa; and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Here vpon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seauen dayes; But Ambrius in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambrius or Omri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Samarria: where he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambrius was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambrius. This Ambrius raigned twelue yeeres, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Samarria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Achab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian.

man: and erected an Altar and a Groue to Baal in Samarria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets: and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samarria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaas) reprimeth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphat in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine as Michaas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and *Ioa*s: besides seauentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Achazon. Elias the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captiues, and with each fiftie fouldiers to bring Elias vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at Elias hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the king; auowing it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeere of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: He allured Iosaphat king of Juda, and the king of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000 sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites ouerthrowne: their king flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the wals as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the wals, threatening, vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Wherevpon the king of Edom brought those of Juda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne: which the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edom's sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the party of the other kings; for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answer of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that he doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie? adding, that the Arameans sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seauen times in Iordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discover to the king of Israel whatsoever the Arameans conspired in his secretest counsell, sent a rouspe of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samarria: Ioram then asked laue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbade him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince in libertie.

The King of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samarria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Arameans affrighted, fled away, and left the siege; an act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Achab obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Maister, Ioram entring vpon his frontiers, rooke Ramoth Gilead: in which war he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Jersalem to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprized him: and and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he receiued a promise from God. That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ierobom, for which he was plagued with greuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazeael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28.yeeres.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioachaz Ioas his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisba the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times; and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his Father Ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amaſia King of Juda, who prouoked him to make the warre, whereupon hee entered Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas reigned fixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessor; but he recouered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift & last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, gouerned fix moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one month, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

Pekahiah or Phacsa, or after Zonaras Phacesia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was slaine by Phaca or Pekab the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekabs time, Phalsar or Tiglat-Phalsar invaded the kingdom of Israel, and wanstion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Iamach, Kedesb, Husor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Gallilee, carrying them captiues into Affria: he was drawne in by Achas king of Iudea against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being waisted by Pekab of Israel, and by Rezin of Damasus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith engaged the Affrian, who first suppressed the Monarchy of Syria and Damasus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Affrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Iudea. Pekab reigned twenty yeeres.

Then Hoshea or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassal of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Affrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebisus king of Egypt: which being knowne to the Affrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Ninuiue in Affria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha a riuer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sebaruagim (a people of Sebar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Assa, which were of the ancient Auini, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Captiues rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Haui, willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or or Intrea, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adads of Damasus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affrian aduise himselfe better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had waisted the Cities of Iudea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hoshea the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Fuda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. 1.

Of Dan, whereof Toppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneeth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Desarts; there entered the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Toppe, or Iapha, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ionas embarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharſis in Cilicia. In the time of the Machabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrisoned in Toppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

In Ascalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Sauour, caused all the Male-children of two yeeres olde and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith Adrichomius.

2. Sam. 1.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Ascalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: not to speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streetes of Ascalon: It is now called Salame. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Pol. 6. 11.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrins Azan: of Azenus (as they say) the sonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers affirm, that it was built by Impier. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyfes the Persian; because belike hee re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is prooued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, & was called Gaza of the Defart.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuier of Befor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betwene Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wildernesse of Beer-sheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, hee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a distinct Kingdome from the Philistin Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Amalechis, Saint Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris; the healthy Countie: so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

1. Sam. 30.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalechites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuier of Befor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Eph. 10. 11. 12.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sopher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Dabir: Iosua 15. 49. it is called Vrbis Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbis Arbabi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Orhaniel, encouraged by *Caleb*s promise of his Daughter in marriage; but that Iosua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appears Ios. 10. 39. This Citie Ios. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Juda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of lesse fame, as Hayn, of which Ios. 19. 7. which also Ios. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinks Halbam is named in 1. Chron. 6. 59. though "in the place of Iosua these two are distinguished) also Tholad so named in 1. Chron. 4. 29. for which Iosua 19. 4. we haue Elieholad. Chatzar-Susa so named in Iosua 19. 5. for which Iosua 15. we haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus.

In the same places of Iosua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountaines of Edoma. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edomaea, in the Desart.

Deut. 1.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandered with her Sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Issac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Iosua, and of the Chronicles about noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed to "Gedor," as it is, 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Ios. 15. 36. is called Gedor and Gederotaima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they feared themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest: vnto which hee carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Riuers are Befor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IUDA.

In Juda the fourth Sonne of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. All which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Desarts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms: Agreeable to the great efficacy of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Citie named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Soueraignie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Beth-semes, Tsiglak, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be measured by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witnesse of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moub, and tooke from them some poyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keni, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the comming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontiertowards Idumaea and the South, Ascensu Scorpiomis, or Acrabim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to bee in that that place: from which name of Acrababim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Taperchie called Acrabathema was denominated: of which we haue spoken in Manasse. On the South side also of Iuda they place the Cities of Iagur, Adama, Adada, Cedes, Alma, Iethnam, and Afor or Chafor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Iuda, of which the Defare and Forrest adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Karkab and Afemon, or Hufmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Iudaea towards the North, wee finde the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Afor, or Chafor, Bebaloth, and the two sochoes: of all which see Iofe 15. 8. v. 1. Iofe 15. also Cariath by Iofua. c. 15. v. 25. called Keriath: whence Iudas the Traitor was called Is-cariath, as it were a man of Cariath. Then Betham the abode of Sampson on which Rehebeam recified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neere vnto this City was that remarkable battaile fought betwene Afa King of Iuda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Afa following the victory as farre as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not farre from Iether, standeth Iarmuth, whose King was slaine by Iofua, and the City ouerturned. Next vnto it is Adarefa the natie Citie of the Prophet Michea: Betwene it and Odolla, Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew Gorgias and sent thence ten thousand Dragons of silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Haulamit selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iofua, and the King thereof slaine. Jonathas Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Cadur or Kala afterward Echela, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward he deliuered from the assaults of the Philistims: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was scene by S. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron, sometime called the Citie of Arabah, for which the Fulgur hath Cariatharbe: the reason of this name they giue as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iaac, and Jacob, were therein buried; but of Adam it is but supposed: and it is plaine by the places, Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arabah here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Gittims called Anakim, whose sonnes it seemes Anak was: and Achimam, Shelhai, and Talmoi (whom Caleb expelled, Iofe 15.) were he sons of this Anak, Nam. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquens, a chaine worne for ornaments; and it seemes that this Anak enriched by the spoyle which himselfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold; and so got this name: and leauing the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that intime the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torquati.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seven yeres before Joseph or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the rest to the Leuites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis or the free Citie, remembred often by Saint Hierome. Then Eglon whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Hiersusalem, Hebron, Iarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibonites, were by Iofua utterly ouertrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emasa, afterward by Iudas Macchabeus (after hee had formerly beaten both Apolonius and Seron) gaue a third overthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the yere 1301. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria of Palestine.

From Emasa toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederotaima, of which and of Gederoth Iofe 15. v. 36. and 41. Then Azecha, to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the foue Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of * Terebinth, or Turpentine, as the Fulgur readeth, I. Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they fear it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Lebens of the Leuites.

It resulted from the subiection of the Iewes while Ioram the sonne of Iosaphat reuled in Hiersusalem: And next vnto this standeth Maceda, which Iofua utterly difpeopled.

On the other side of Emasa towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethfara, and Bethfor: one of the strongest and most fought for places in all Iuda. It is seated on a high Hill, and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the Rocks, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Iudas Macchabeus. Lyfius fort it; and Antiochus Eupator ref. 13. ant. 9. by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethlem is the next vnto it within fixe miles of Hiersusalem, otherwise Leban: sometimes Ephraim; which name, they say, it had of Caleb wife, whereas it is so called by Mose before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abesam or Isa- zab, Judge of Israel, after Iephrah, famous for the thirty Sonnes and thirty Daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Mab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethlem: and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Ishai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to bee the natie Citie of our Saviour Iesus Christ; and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zadabon of Galilee there was also a Citie of the same name: and therefore was this 10 of our Saviour called Bethlem Iuda.

From Bethlem some foure or five mile standeth Thecua, the Citie of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the Citie of Bethzacaria, in the way betwene Beth- sur and Hiersalem: on whose Hills adioyning the glorious guilt fields of Antiochus (hu- like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Iewes). The Citie of * Bezek was also neere vnto Bethlem, which Adam-Bezek commanded, who had during his raigne tortured 70. Kings by cutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the same end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Iuda, after they had taken him prisoner.

Thereto of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe 30 by vntill wee come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which *Heroderect*ed on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200. Marble Steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desert of Ezrael, betwene it and Tekoa, is that climax floridus, where in the time of Iehosaphat, the Iewes stood and lookt on the Mo- abites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnely came and blessed God for so strange deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboam: and Tjohar which the Fulgur calleth * Segor: so called because Lot in his prairie for it wred that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tjohar which signifieth a little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 22. In the Romanes times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balexona. Then En- gaddi or Hemagaddi, first Afsonthamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balfammum, the best that the world had called Opobalsammum: the most part of all which Trees Cleo- ptra Queene of Egypt sent for out of Iudaea, and Herod who either feared or loued An- thonie her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neere Heliopolis in Egypt. This Citie was first taken by Chedorlamer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudaea: and one of the Presidences thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Isefrael, not that which 50 was the Citie of Naboth, of which already: but another of the same name, the Citie of Actinon, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Ammon, whom Abalom slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Amasa, *Abalom*s Lieutenant, and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neere of the words, Israel and Isefrael: and because the 2. Sam. 17. 25. Amasias father is called a Israhelite, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israhelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amasias Father is not said to be of the Citie Isefrael, but an Israhelite in Religion, though otherwise an Israhelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills and Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon

Of others which stand single, theris that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome callen a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the yonger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achile, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the olde Caste, erected by Ionathas Machabaeus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltica, this Countie had to foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnatural finnes.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The Seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites waunge from Sehon King of Hesbon.

IN the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Esau or Edom the Idumeans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah's last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly posselt by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Aegypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esau and his sonnes held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sar to Hawilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and pulling ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Armon, as farre North as Essebon, or Coesbon.

Ammon late downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and posselt the Tract from Rabbah afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountaines of Gilbead, and without them as farre North as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboc and Danajcus was held by the Amorites themselues, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first posselt by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlahomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzumims or Zurims, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlahomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestors beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countie, betwene Abarim and Iordan, and driven them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivall vpon that border, when Phah gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Phah, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electing, as the Edumeans anciently were.

Now shall we part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrivd there out of Aegypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Phah the Iudge of Israel lustily defend the regaining of those Countie against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Phah) had 300. years time to recouer them, Iudg. 11. and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruell why the Ammonites in Rephahs time should make claime to these Countie: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites posselt, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Rephahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Souerainetie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilbead, and as farre South as Arroer belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Iahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iaboc: Sehon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displanted both Moab and Ammon 30. of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon, loas at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc, which at length the Gadites posselt, as in the 13. chapter of Iosua, vers. 25: it appears.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Pulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Ieshon. The Pulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two vers. 36. and 37. in 2. 1. Ios. being wanting in the olde Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Ieshon.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desert adioyning: from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedmoth is mentioned, the Pulgar for Ieshon reads Bosor in solitude Midior, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Arichonius makes a Towne called Midior, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedmoth nere the Dead Sea (for the Countie betwene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lafa or Lefbush, of which Genesis 10. vers. 19. The Greekes call it Cal. Irbis: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweeter water; all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was deperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fontaines are found in the Pyrgenes; and in Pera, called the Baths of the Ingas or Kings. The other towne is Macherus, the next betwene Lafa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest Inland Citie and Caste, standing vpon a Mountaine every way vnacceffible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the war with Arifobolus, faith Iofephus. It was thither (faith Iofephus) that Herod sent Iohn Baptift, and wherein hee was flaine: his amie foone after being viceroy throwne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himfelfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farre from Maacharus was Bofor, Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and nere it Lunias vpon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Liniæ the mother of Tiberius Cæfar.

To the North of Lunias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cozbi, with his fpeare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midft of their finne: and from hence Iofua sent the Difcouersers to view Ierico, ftaying heere vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrem Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Iof. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius, calling Cedronum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, where the iuft being placed, grow as the Cedars, Plal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country hereabout, by Mofes called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the fame booke precifely bounded by Mofes. On the South it had the great Defert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chaferoth, & Dizabab (of which the two former is that Gazorus, of which Platome in Palestina, the later was a Tactie belonging to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petraea, where was Mezabab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medana and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuter. 1. 1) the fame which the Geographers call Lubias: and some confound it with Lunias, of which euen now wee fpeake.

Alfo on the fame North fide towards the confines of Calefryia, it had Theophel: where about sometime Pella of Calefryia flood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Butis. It is alfo noted in Mofes to be ouer-against or nere vnto Suph, for which the vulgar hath the Red Sea, as alfo Numb. 2. 14. it tranflate the word Suphab in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no mention of any word in the Hebrew to fignifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is fo to be taken, vith the addition of Mara, thereby to diftinguifh it from the region of Suph or Suphab: which doubtleffe was about thefe Plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Country being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as alfo the dead Sea was called Mara Suph, for like reason.

The place in thefe large Plaines of Moab, where Mofes made thofe diuine exhortations, fome fay was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the Storie of Gedeon is called Beth bara. Iofephus faies it was where after the Citie Avila flood, nere Jordan, in a place fet with Palme trees: which fure was the fame as Abel-fittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that fome call Abel fathaim and Bel-fathim) which is reckoned by Mofes in that place of Numbers for the 43. and laft place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Mofes: This place is alfo called Sittim; which word if we fhould interpret, we fhould rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of thefe Plaines of Moab, they place the Citie, Nebo, Baal-Mon, Silma and Heshon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elhahel, and Kiriathama the feate of the Giant Emim. Of thefe two firft of thefe Mofes feemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: becaufe they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Ef. 46. 1. reads Deus quatinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-mon is the habitation of Baal. Of the fame Idoll was the Hill Nebo in thefe parts denominat: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phafgab, Mezabab by his death faw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which Itoric Iunius doth not take Phafgab or Pifgab, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, fignifying a Hill: and fo alfo Fatablus in fome places; as Numb. 21. 20. where hee noteth that fome call Pifgab that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be fomewhat ftrengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Iof. 13. 20. called Alphoth-Pifga, which is as much as decursus Pifga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pifga. In the fame place of Iofua there is alfo named Beth-por, as below belonging to Reuben: fo called from the Hill Por: from whence alfo Baal the Idoll was called Baal-por, which they fay was the fame as Prappus: the cheefe place of whole worship feemes to haue beene Bamoth-Bahal, of which alfo Iof. 13. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Numb. 22. 41. they read the high places of Baal (for fo the word fignifieth) to which place Balaak firft brought Balaam to curfe the Israelites.

f. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

There were besides thefe diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michal from Dauid: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering fo much out of Efay 10. vers. 29. where it is named amongst the Cities of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may fay that Mathaus and Nahaliel were in thofe confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites paff after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the reft of the Cities of Moab.

Midian alfo is found in thefe parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Midianites there were two Nations, of which thefe of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelue thoufand Israelites, fent by Mofes out of the Plaines of Moab: at fuch times Israel began to accompanie their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothfayer were then flaine: and their Regall Citie with the reft destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but reliued & affifted the Israelites in their painfull trauals through the Deserts: and were in all that paffage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupe or petra. It was alfo called Iothbeth, as appears by the place 2 Reg. 14. It was built (faith Iofephus) by Liba, one of thofe five Kings of the Madianites flaine as before is faid: after whom it was called Recon: Now they fay it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding ftrength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the firft and ftrongeft Citie: the fame perhaps which plinie and Strabo call Nabutha, whence alfo the Prouince adioyning tooke name: which name feemes to haue been taken at firft from Nabathoth the fonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathas is no where vnderftood for all Arabia Petraea, (at leaft where it is not mif-vnderftood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudea. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Platome calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all thofe Territories of the Cufites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Bafan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be alfo true, that fome part of Arabia the Defert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the firft of Chronicles the fifth calls Hagarims of Hagar.

This Citie Petra, Scarus befieged with the Roman Armie, & finding the place in fiew impregnable, he was content by the perfuafion of Antipater, to take a composition of money, & to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Iuda (after he had flaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called Salinarum) was alfo this Citie. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabit to be natural of this Citie. In the meane time when the Chriftians held the Kingdom of Ierufalem, it had a Latine Bifhop, hauing before beene vnder the Greeke Church. It is feated not far from Har where Aaron died, & on the other fide towards the North is the river of Zared or Zered, by which Mofes incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichome describeth the waters of Nemrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and fo hee doth the Valley of Saua: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it feemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refeth the Plaines of Moab: and the confluence of thofe waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Saua alfo cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, & vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the purfuit of the Affirian and Perfian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saua, or Sauab, which is the Kings Dale, where Abfalom fct vp his Monument, as it feemes, not farre from Ierufalem. And at the fame time Melchizedec King of Salem

What name they vied for Nebo it doth not appeare: but Balaam in it fometimes they named Sometime Bagis, as Ef. 15. 2. and Sometime Beth-mon Efay 48.

also incountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either near Bethsan otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not incountner each other in Arabia: and therefore Sane, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. IIIL Of the Dead Sea.

Now because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also to the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea * of the plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeeres seene this Sea, did account it (saith Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirte of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, speciei maris, sapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis pestifer: neq. vento impellitur neq. pisces aut suetas aquas volucres patitur incertum unde superiecta res solido feruntur, perit imperitq. nandi perinde attolluntur. That is it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of small infectious, and pestilent to the borderers. It is neither moued nor raised by the winde: nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnskillfull of swimming, as well as the skillfull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yere it catcheth up Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vsed in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, were sometime fruitful and adomed with great Cities were burnt with lightning, of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as hauing lost p her fruitfulness; for whatsoever doth either grow or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes." Thus saith Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake catcheth vp, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltis. Josephus desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not onely vnskillfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sinke.

†. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben posselt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab but fro Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Inimus in the 21. of Numbers, ver. 14. nameth Pahel, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the son of Zipper: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curfings or incantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some petulant diseases; And though Balaam at the first, moued by the spirit of God, bid Israel contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Madianitish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the habitation of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his euill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee find in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozabai, and Iosb, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the tribe of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse. These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hee prius fuerit, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eighteen yeeres: which Eglon, Ehad flew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against to whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued David, and releued him; knowing that Saul sought his life.

After this, David himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot. ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that hee would tread downe the Idumeans.

The next King after Davids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Melba: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the feuerie of David) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who reuolting againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Iehoram: with whom ioynd the Kings of Iuda & Idumea: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, hee fledde to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed: There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumeans, invaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victorie ouer them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Melba of Hierem. 27. Moab many deicents: for Melba liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, foureene Kings of Iuda coming betwene, who waited three hundred and odd yeeres.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which layned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as we see farre to the South as Arzer. Of the children of Gad the seventh son of Jacob by Leah, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Liboe diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele, and Apher.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Arzer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Ianius is more diligenter to those words of Moses, Dent. 2. 36. Ab habhero, quae est in ripa fluminis Arnon, et Cinuatae ipsa quae est in flumine; Where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished from the Citie upon the bank of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. 12. v. 2. and 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Harob which doubletse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was inde de seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer posselt by Moses, it is plainc Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harob, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Ianius proueth out of Genib. 21. 15. where Arnon is saide to bee diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Harob is said to bee seated before Rabbab: which Rabbab as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they feare not Harob neere it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah heere we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Aror Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harob. And as for Har (which also gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Ma-gites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlamer and his Associates: but Harob by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hierome time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was there called Vitula conuersans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice overthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Salissa which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quake.

Brocard takes Harob to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted, seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Harob is in the North-east border. Betwene Harob and Jordan they seate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numb. 32.34. though Iosua 13.20 vers. 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hierome prophesied, that it should perish: and the Lakes about it turne with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hierome time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aror, was Bethim-rab, of which Esay prophesieth. That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the coale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethimrab in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Iogbeha, and Nobach or Nabe: of both which we read in the storie of Gedeon: and that Iogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32.35. and therefore Nobach also must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobach also (saith hee) went and noted Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the euesel precedent speake of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue feared this seate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, v. 34.35.36. therefore it may seeme that this Nobach was in than part of Manasse, which was in the East of Jordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas hee supposed it to be the same with Reb, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake in the Tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmanub rested themselves in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Nabach and Iogbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3.25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain that it was a principall Citie held still by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hatath: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hatath, the later Hatath-Sophan: for which latter the Vulgar makes two Cities, Reb and Sophan: the name Hatath, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethimrab, of which we haue spoken, Iosua. cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethimra, is said to haue been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-haram, some take to be Betarapha, (of which B. Iosaphus) after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Betarapha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramath of which Aramath there is mention in Iosaphus or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of those Countries, we read; Acts 7.43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephan, 1. Machub. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolue. But touching Iulius (according to Iosaphus sometimes Betarapha) the same Iosaphus placeth in the Region of Perea, beyond Jordan, which Regio Perea, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio Iulior, or the Countrey beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Perea, take more paines then needs. Fourte cerre Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosaphus. He makes it to haue beene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his Wife, into the Italian family: by which adoption she was called Iulia. Ano Iosaph. Ant. 18.2. which Iulias, hee saith was builded by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, & Belusid. 2.3. which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Vpon the Sea of Galilee neere to Iulias in Perea, (that is, in the Region ouer Jordan) they finde Vitezabrah, as it is called in Iosaphus, for Beth-zabab, which is as much as domus Iosaph. de Bell. Ind. 7. c. 4. Iosaphi. Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safeguard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hiernsalem, and was there besieged, Iosaphus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she ate her owne childe; with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is layne by the story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebach and Salmanub, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeon returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a the rhing Carre of Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thomes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which fort also Dauid vied (some of the Ammonites, though not with Thomes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As 2 Sam. 12.31. for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in halfe, either for Men or Cattell, Moses. Gen. 33.17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Ramesses in Aegypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vied after for forty yeeres in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

Otherfour Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 2.13.8. Ramoth in Gilehad, Machanaïm, Cheshon, and Iahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Iahzer, as Cheshon or Heshon was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Num. 32.1. his Countrey is called the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophesie of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which Esay 6.8. place of Esay also Hierome in a like prophesie alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Maccabaeus: as it is 1 Macc. 5.8. where Iunius out of Iosaphus reade Iahzer though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16.3. & 8. and Ind. 1.29.) was farre from these Countreies of Se- 40 hon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomon time, for whom the King of Aegypt won it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshon it may be marvelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1 Chron. 6.8. it should be said to haue beene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cashon, 1 Macc. 5.36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Iudas Maccabaeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cashon had beene the Cheshon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word signifieth a double Arme, we reade Gen. 32.2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Iacob in manner of another Host or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2.13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoste of Heauen, which appeared to the sheepe-herds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Pends of middle-England, Bede reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Amnius Lieutenant to Vespasian, and 2000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine King of Hierusalem: and by him utterly razed. Necce vito Gerass is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Magedu, or after the Greeke Migdale, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dabaranutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay betwene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one, and findes it to be Elhid, the fontaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida to be either Magdala or Dabaranutha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Iulias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Turea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Iulias, the wife of Tiberius, called Iulias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Iulias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Mat. 20 them, Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Basán. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Canaan, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim significeth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomie significeth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to have beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expounding heroes * radimantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og rex residuo gigantum; with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og rex reliquius Raphaim: but if the Carnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not have beene in the duall number: neither would Iaques in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Carnaim; but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for periphrasie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazim. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Judith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vñ in that place of Judith, and ioyneith Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenita Cedar, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decore, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petrea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) saye many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be confirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembred in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esaus, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyranus, Oleaster, and Bel-larmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory, with with Athanasius, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius, Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eusebius and other, as S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Euzagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Huts or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Oús, which the Septuaginta for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. 2. 1. Sometime Asthis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palastina and Celestria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) vnder Palmyrene in the Countie called by Ptolomee Trachonitis or Bathanaea, the bounds of which Countie are confounded with Basán, in this halfe Tribe of Manasse. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israhelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneum turbam, because their bounds were not only ioyned but confounded, and their Seigniories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Hierem, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same prophetic, of which hee speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, q̄ que habitas in terra Hutz, O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom que habitas in terra Hus, Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned have thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, seeing this Land of Hus to be in Edumaea. For it is very probable that Esaus when hee departed from Iacob, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Hermon, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir, and from this habitation did Esaus encounter Iacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaus his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esaus inhabited Seir to the South of Iudea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward feared themselves to the South of Iudea, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Desart as farre as Hor where Azazel died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because their Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iob's friends, which seemes to be of Iob's owne Countie, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25, in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betweene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 22. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of this booke, where he saith that one of Iob's friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as he readeth not de familiâ Aram, or Ram, but de familiâ Syria: like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iob's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindred, as also by the Septuaginta's addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implied that they thought onely Elihu to haue beene of Iob's owne Countie.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourne from Acra Eastward, findeth Suetia, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinkes that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Reura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sacae. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

For usu and su are often changed one into the other: whence they read Ausitis for Ousitis, &c. Hence also by Iunius and others it is called Ausitis, and so as it seems they read it in the Septuaginta. Iun. in Gen. 10. 23.

Deut. 5. 5.

Whence the Septuaginta call him ex regione Ausitis.

See Sextus Seneca.

Eliphaz was, to haue bene of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue bene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Ejau. And so also Nahamah, whence Tisbhar the third of Iob's friends (which in this place of Iob c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expofitor, thought either to be named of Thinnath by transposition of letters (which Thinnath, Gen. 3. 6. 40. is named among the sonnes of Ejau that gaue denomination to the places where they were feated) or else to be the same Nahamah, which Iof. 15. 4. 1. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Bafan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manaffes, there is a Region which at least in later times was called Sutis, or offome like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Willielmus Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Sutia or Suites (as he calls it diuerfly) of exceeding great strength and vife for the retaining of the whole Countrie: which, in the time of Salomone, the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians: hauing not long before bene lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be fixtene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles Northward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manaffes named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behshihera, Mitpha of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the comming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitpha of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Behshihera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Bafan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bazra, it is confounded with Beser or Bazra of Reuben, and with Bazra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iofua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst between Casarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more compact, leauing the marsh ground on both sides, for Lions and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manaffes, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tisfad, Chauran, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West, of which three Cities were at Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, between Tisfad, and Chatsar-Henan, Ziphron is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auritis regio, in Iosephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Geffur and Maba of Chathor or Macari, which were likewise borderers to Manaffes toward the North-east) are vnkowne: onely that Geffur was of might, it appears in that Dauid married Maba the Daughter of Thalmay King of Geffur: by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abfalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

S. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus and the diuers fortunes thereof.

*D*amascus of all other in this Border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse, and the House of pleasure, and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue bene built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which opinion S. Hier.

S. Hierome vpon Ejau seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward, a thing very unlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damascus. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadazer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadzer king of Sophenia (otherwise Syria Suba or Zobah) Razon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascus, and posselt Damascus in selfe, and became an enemi to Salomon all his life.

The next King of Damascus was Azad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Dauid and Isab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypt's wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Azad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Azad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Affrians and then the Gracians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abraham and Parpar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoas the golden river. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitful of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cur in many marbles in that Citie. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Ejau, Hieremie and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar, imited by Abas, King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Ejau: which thing was performed by Salmanassar, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, five yeeres after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies: but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Maxellus and Lollus. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of Fraunce, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Hilon the Tartar incompass it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatened extreame torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendered the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne alunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Hilon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yeere 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Partians, invaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners, those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: hee forbore the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanterns of gold and siluer: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his returne after three moneths siege hee forst it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, hee burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophy of his victorie hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and reposselt by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians:

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mabometans, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hu the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Elieser Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Iesus, and the Iudges, as impertinent to that storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubei, inhabiting betwene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were leuied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 12000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Commander of his armie, taking advantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadazer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Ituraea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadazer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome, it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Isidians and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Ituraea, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumaea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that Region, and left Ioab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seede, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Ioab (whom indeede all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwile. For as I take it, Adadazer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grev powerfull, tooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Affrians, saith Macrobius, which signified onnesse or Virtue. I also finde a Citie called Adad in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-azer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. An that Adadazer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vndertooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuied 12000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, the most of which of Adadazer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whofocuer was the first, whether Adadazer, or Adad of Idumaea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumaea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabriemmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings. For Asa King of Iuda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & invaded by Basbas, the successeur of Adad, the son of Reboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabriemmon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to inuade Israel (while Basbas sought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing received his presents, willingly inuaded the Countrie of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Basbas had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuered them to his owne vse.

This Benhadads Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon inuaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streetes or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which inuaded Basbas, at the request of Asa; But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Basbas time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when he inuaded Basbas, and after that 49. yeeres ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is vnlikly that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon inuaded Basbas and Omri; and Benhadad the second inuaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by assaile of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites, besides 27000. which were crushed by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom hee rendereth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab inuaded Gilead, and assigeth the Citie, being assisted by Iosephat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Toram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh quarrell against Toram: and when Toram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departeth home, and sickness, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonarus and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that he and his successeur Azael were worshipped for Gods by the Syrians to his time, for the presumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 100. yeeres are complete since their warres with the Israelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elisba, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Ben- hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged warre with Ioram, who received diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Iezreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahabziah, or Ochozias, are slaine by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azrael continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, ouer Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and tooke Gath, but by gifts from Iosias he was auerted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehofaphat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Azrael presented Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to warre vpon Basbas King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosias and Azrael, yet a part of his Armie spoiled the other Prouinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azrael vexed Iosias the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremity, he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFTER HAZUEL, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of HAZUEL, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill success: for Iosias King of Israel, the sonne of the unhappy Ioachaz, as hee was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and hee lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father HAZUEL had taken violently from Israel.

After this Benhadad the sonne of HAZUEL, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosias recovered Damascus it selfe, to Judah, saith the Genecis, but better in Hebrew, utique recuperabat Damascus; & Chamatham Ichude pro Israele; that is, And hee recovered for Israel, Damascus; Chamatham of Judea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by Dauid, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehosias the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of HAZUEL, and had recovered the Cities which HAZUEL had won from Israel, and so left his Kingdom to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and hauing nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razins, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rases, after Zonaras Raason, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone invaded Elath, and bearing out the Tewer, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razins, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Affrians becomming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

1. Adadzer the sonne of Rehob.
2. Rezin the sonne of Eliadad, or Razins.
3. Rezin.
4. Tabeemmon.
5. Benhadad, who invaded Basbas.
6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.
7. HAZUEL, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his advancement; the same who overthrew Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second HAZUEL which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that HAZUEL which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosias, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazael which stilled his master Benhadad, and had slaine Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Das began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Ierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael that tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdom, and Commander of Benhadads men of warre. To this Hazael, be he the first or second, succeeded:

8. Benhadad the third, whom Iosab King of Israel thrice ouerthrew.
9. Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolaus Damascus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gessur, we finde that Tobu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent, Sam. 8. 36 his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadzer. Also Sennacherib Esa. 37 speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

20. Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affrians, neuer recovered themselves againe.

For Gessur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmu, and his Father Ammihur: To Talmu, whose daughter Dauid married, it was that Abshalon fledde, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Celsofria, there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adadzer, and Adadzer himselfe, and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principallities. And the race of the Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, 30. Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with Dauid, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Affrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Affrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entered the borders thereof (Menabem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warlike as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the help of his companion Arbaces, had wrested 40 from Sardanapalus: hauing besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding to excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that warre, and waited in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possessed himselfe of the Cities of Nephtalim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nibomassar, after the revolt of Hofea, forced Samaria, and rent the Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanasser ouerturne; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ofis ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly utterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeere of Hosea: that of Juda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeere of Salmansar, to the last of Balsasar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeeres. After these the Persians from 3811. unto Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucida reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the nations to bordering vpon the Israelites; with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an afflicted face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENIAMIN, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of diuer memorable places in the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

Of the Tribe of Beniamin, the twelfth and yongest sonne of Isach, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan; betweene Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Jordan, are Lod, Haded, and Ono: of which Lod and Ono were built by Shimon a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited with Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esd. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Haded, Ono, makes besides Haded in Nehemia, a Citie called Lodbadid: This Haded or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Maccabaeus.

Samarim or Tjemaraim, named of Tjemary, one of the sonnes of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies, and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitfull valley, adorned with many palm trees: and thereupon fore elsewhere called the citie of Palmes. From the time of Iosua, who utterly destroyed it, lay waste vntill the time of Achab: in whose dayes Chief of Bethel held the new Temple is foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his yongest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosua: in which and other respects, Hos. 12. 14. calleth Iosua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Pashur, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the South-east of Iericho stood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Ios. 21. 18. To the South Beitaraba, of which Ios. 15. 5. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Desert, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem praebr. Egyptiac, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Colubus preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Giloth, as appears by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Ios. 22. 13. and Giloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hills Gazazim and Hebel: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Beniamin (of which also wee read of in the Scripture) were seated about the midde of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason * Sa. 2. 1. Sam. 7. 15. Imael chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vied yeerely to come, is Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-betharim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Iosua pitched vp the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which storie, as it is set down Ios. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yeerely to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 10. 1. and another against the Philistims, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabaeus gathered the Tewes, (when Hierusalem was possessed by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Orationis fuerat Mitspa ante Israel. Touching this Mitspa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembred, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Ios. 15. 38. * Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebusites, and also in the time of the Maccabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus: so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Ierury, as Gouvernour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Tewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall blood of Juda, as then it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Beniamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Ios. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iudg. 1. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacob's vision: as how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calves heere, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it Beth-anen, that is, the house of Vanitie, Ios. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them ouer.

The territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboam (of which 2. Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the storie of Iosias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2. Reg. 23. whence those coats 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Aphreema, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seignories or Prefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Tewes, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Ios. 18. 23. is called Hephram, belonging to this Tribe of Beniamin.

Not farre from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we findeth three other Cities often mentioned in the continuall of the Kingdomes of Juda and Israel betweene Hai and Bethel, Ios. 7. 21. and 18. 12.

in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebah. Of the name Rama,^b it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seemes because Mat. 2. it appeares that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have bene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asher, as it seemes, wee haue testimonie, Iof. 19. 29. and of another in Nephtalim, Iof. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1. Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called Ramathaim, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim Tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Iofeph of Arimathaea, Mat. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama wee read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, feared as we said, neere Bethel the vttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Basfa in the time of Afa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flie from him to Afa. Of this Rama or Ramath I should rather thinke Iofeph was, that buried Christ: because it is neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudea, as it appeares Esa. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that he spake of that Rama with whose stones (after Basfa had ceased to build it) Afa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. wee read that Iofiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost vtterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichamius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished Esa. 10. 27. of which word Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this Citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appeares Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodge³⁰ ing at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sam. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some Pulgar out at towne or Citadell called Rama: where Junius reads in exceffo, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings palace in this Citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Siddelech, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode; was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Iof. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-aen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iofua c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Iof. 8. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum: Another Citie of chiefe note is reckoned Iof. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbion, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to faue their liues, is set downe Iof. 9. whence they were reckoned⁴⁰ among the Nethinai or Proflites: and were bound to certaine publicke seruices in the house of God: who oath of fauing the Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibeon or Gibbion with Almon and Iebah (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanoth the natall place of Eliet the Prophet, were said Iof. 2. 1. 28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanoth was Nob, as appeares 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Eliathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9. 3. 1. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-iearim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul proued in this place (as is set downe 1. Sam. 22. 1. 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is⁵⁰ proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe, 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Ionathan) and there also was Ionathan Macchabeus his aboad, 1. Macc. 9. 73. Of Gisgala in Galilee Iofephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Thursis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, & come to the Citie of Hierusalem and the Princes Princes and Gouernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Iof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

What time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princeesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagineth that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrams time. But * according to others, that Citie * See in the higher halfe of Manasse. to out of which Melchisedec incourted Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the riuer of Iordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iofua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazer the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iofua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusites (the children of Iebus ens to the sonne of Canaan) built: after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance posselt it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increafe of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salamon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch like hath feldome bene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salamon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Aegypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adad the Idumean, and Ieroboam, Salamons seruants; and both married to Aegyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first inuaded the Territorie of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salamon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadzer, Tobu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sacked, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioaas King of Israel: while Amasias the twelfth King thereof gouerned Juda.

Not long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impouerished the Temple, and presented Typhalpassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the sonne of Ezekiab, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaults made by Ezekiab, to the Embassadors of Mede, rodech, lost the remaine, and the very bottoome of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Ioukim then reigning. But this vngodly, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietic, filling the Citie cun to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full secentie yeeres, in somuch as Sion was not onely become as a stone and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heape of stone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars; but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that desiled yoyle.

Then 70 yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie difficultie enough : and the Citie meanelie inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odd yeeres, till Nubem by the favour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by Ptolomeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craffus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberallitie of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the said Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the days of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Saviour Christ Jesus and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Jesus the Roman, being stirred up by God, to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jewes, from all parts, were come to the celebration of the Passover: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civill dissension, oppress them within the walles; a terrible enemy assailed them without. The Idumaeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jewes Kingdom, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as that which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleieve that there had bene any such place or habitation. Only the three Herodian towres (works most magnificent, and over-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jewes as were scattered heere and there in Judea, and other Provinces, began againe to inhabit some part of the Citie, and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to revolt, and rebell, Aelius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold: That there should not stand one stone upon another, of that vneratifiable Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Calvarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, Aelia Capitolina. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which hee did in despite of the Jewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place out-topping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palastina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres. It was afterward in the 636. yeere after Christ, taken by the Aegyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bullon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey foure score and eight yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Aegyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarec, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Jerusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slaughter; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that feede thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitye, and fruitfulness; witnesseth the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the daies of the Kings of Judea and Israel; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barrenne. Itallo pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heaven, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe; neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned; but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the ruine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Jewes.

IF the originall of the Jewes, prophane writers haue conceived diuersly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Aegyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierusalem, and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; to whom Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule discates, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seauenth day, for this cause euer after observed the seauenth day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discomicing their vncleaneesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Aegyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine.

Corneilius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgotteth himselfe, hauing in the fifth booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deities by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Citie by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Indas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jewes.

Cited by Stephanus in Indas.

Claudius Iolus draws them from Iudeus, whose parents were Sparton and Thebis; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedemonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruerred, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creation; of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which failings, as touching the Jewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appion, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originallie, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarians, deriue the Hebrewes or Jews, from Araxon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being mozt of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Indas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Iudeans or Jewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the tenne Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apol.

Caleb. f. 63.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Aegyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simcon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellst Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious

The Tribes of Juda and Simoon did also master and possesse during this inter-regnum (or as some thinke, before the death of Iosua) the Cities of Azotus, Ascalon, Ebron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Lebuzites after recified. They tooke also the Cities of Hieron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people, as Moses and Iosua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he with the aduice of phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if you thinke that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Iosua gouerned, as appeares, Ios. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Canaanites: for the performance of which enterprife, hee promised his Daughter Achisaph, which he performed to Othoniel his yonger brother after the conquest: whose behauiour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Juda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recouered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleys, because they had Chariots of Iud. 1. 19.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recouered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recouer from Dan all the plaine Countries, and forst them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Aseroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their Idolatrie, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusshan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othoniel to be their Iudge and Leader: who by Gods assistance, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and enforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Deserts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning; after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othoniels government. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to haue bene the yonger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Judges hee is twice called Othoniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words (Calebs yonger brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kinned. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her owne Vnkle; yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel should haue bene the meanest of the kinned. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneth, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iosuah to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue bene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Laisb was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that betwene the times of Iosua and Othoniel that ciuill Warre brake out betwene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Juda ledde the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue bene when Iosua was dead, & before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other other times wherein they wanted Gouvernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mulstered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations : and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othomiel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the first King of Athens : who began to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othomiel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Erichtheus : his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes : of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater : vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharsus, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron :

but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunning, lie both in iron & brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes : whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Gracians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Viues vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him native of Attica : and the sonne of Eleusus King of Eleusina : which Eleusus by careful industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent : who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation : it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othomiel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow ; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life : and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conuerfant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they began to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the reignes of Heathen Kings & Princes, but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth, and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seuentie Weekes, and in what not. Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposit, & contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before : I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations : and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion : which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad coniecturam querenda ; In ancient things wee are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diadore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tercus, Tantalus, Tiryus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

After the death of Othomiel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moab to inuade and suppress them : to performe which he ioynd the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readilie findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feeble the difference betwene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel : whom God himselfe exposed to those perils : within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eigheteen yeeres vnder Eglen King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance : but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gerat to deliuer them : by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglen, whom if he could but extinguish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory : especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to choise a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglen, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appeale him, and obtaining private access vpon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge : and thrusting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, hee did repaile Jordan, and inuading the Territorie of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men : whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Sangar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade : the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourecore yeeres from the death of Othomiel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauielled into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to bee referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourecore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hipponum in Sicilia : or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere hee calleth Chemer, it hee meant not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrrhus, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioynd themselves, they agreed together to recouer her : but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrhus, and tate him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him : and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus : whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hells. But Zexes, as I take it, hath writtten his storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrhus, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina : Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrrhus were both taken : and because Pyrrhus was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euristheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossians which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting aecre the Mountaines of Pindus : of which Mountaines Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The Riuer of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Melosi in Theffali: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athen, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athen. In his time also Tereus rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuiled of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athen to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not come to plaine; perfwading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behauiour towards her, Philomela exprest by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whercof Progne caused her onely sonne Irys, to bee cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary foodde: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands, and feete, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athen where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets faigned, that there was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built nere the Rockes Mery, in the Territorie of Athen. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things so are supposed to haue beene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias alei) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryssa, (as the Poets call him Odryssius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farr from Attica, a Citie whercof is called Daulia, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athen made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryssa, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue beene partly because, as Pausanias sayes, Daulide nec nidificans, nec habitans in tota circum regione Hirundines: As if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for euer after haue that place.

Nere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Pratus King of the Argines, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Tuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name: about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, deuiled the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Meones. Of Tantalus was deuiled the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and to some to the covetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Didymus in Zeus, gae him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he caused his owne Sonne to be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres are part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuiled, that he had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Quis

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma sugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth misse
The fleeing fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discouered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Silene Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs sitiens fugientia captat Flumina, quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is faigned of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis our of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus, Coctans conuiuiis Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitye,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often perueried by an vnclane and defiled minde.

Tertius is giuen (saith Christ in Marke) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So is it said of him that hee expanded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset offiri ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem calum tritum & vsq. ad illud profectio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius de rebus ratione constaret; si Paul might haue vntered the things, the knowledge whercof the third heauen, and his going thither did bring vnto him; per aduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reucelin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram expone-re, aut myseria, quæ ita reciperet, ut Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabeus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo diuinorum arcana patescerent, quæ meditando scilicet, quàm loquendo apprehenduntur: To sit an Asse to a harpe, or to learne myseries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Lye a viall, or Scarabies and vnclane flies puerigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not discloſe diuine myseries to the common sort, which are easier learn'd by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their myseries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of so other couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Titys liued whom Apollo slew, because he fought to force his Mother Latona. Euphorios hath it thus, that Titys was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus, which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Tuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Titys: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourish'd, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirmes that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homer:

*Porrectuque nouem Tityus per iugera terra,

Nine furlongs stretch lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liuer daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocia, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thebes liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued to as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellepont, and fled into Phrygia; wheretogether with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the wals of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

*Ilion apicis, firmataque turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ fructa canore byra.*

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with wals and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonie.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witness, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perseus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduenture on Africa) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phœnus, being weakly accompanied as she hunted, neere the Lake Triton, was surprisid and slaine: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished, which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Euseb. in Chron.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisiphus: who incited by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Prius of the Argives, to accompanie her, but refusing it, she accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prius sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betweene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him against Chimera, a Monster, yomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocencie, sent him the winged Horle Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bide, but Minerva: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimera: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those, he arrived to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdaining, caused one of his flaming fyes so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiter's owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Same. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocencie and vnderferued aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreame hazard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing over-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euer during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beafts this Monster Chimera was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purified with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horle: to whom the inuention of sails (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlkely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for to Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Æneas.

10 Iou also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iou) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Iones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iauan. Perhaps it might be so that Iou himselfe tooke name from Iauan: it being a custome observable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

§. IIII.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

10 After Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being wome out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle security, so is security a fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their finnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to leue a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harasab the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the dayes of Iephtha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meane. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resistlesse, hee overthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his marchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Mosys time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iofa: sometimes by the ministrie of men, as when hee overthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlosomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. He caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the sight of Iehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this iourney that thou takest, shall not be for thine honour, for Iud. 4. 9. the

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Iabin fell to the ground, euent to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Iabin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or spear scene among fortie thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were feuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Jordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Ishobites kept the Sea-coast, and forooke their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Menus, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondencie with Iabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee deniceth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Iabins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdome Viues out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus diuided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos in selfe: Praxus his brother posselt Ephyras or Corinth, and Tirynchos, and other Cities with all the Termitone towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynchos, which witness Praxus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other Worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Praxus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Sapphodes reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation:

*Inclusam Danaen, turris aenea, Robustaq; fores, & vigilum canum
Tristes excubia, munerant satis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:*

Si non Acrisium Virginis abdita Custodem pauidum, Iupiter & Venus Rississent, fore enim intumescer & patens, Conuerso in pretium Deo.

*Anno per medios ire satellites,
Exterumpere amat saxa, potius
Ictum fulminco.*

The brazen Tower with dores close bard,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,
Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret loue:
Till smiling Venus, and wise Ioue Beguild her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden shower,
The god into her lap did powre
Himselfe; and tooke his pleasure.
Through gardes, and stonie wals to breake,
The thunder-bolt is farre more weaké,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. so was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piraeus, Phorbas,
Triopas, Crotopus, Sthenelus,
Danaus, Lynceus, Abas, Acrisius, Pelops.

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus,
Sthenelus,
Eurystheus,

Atreus and Thyestes } The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atreus by Europe had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon, Egisthus, Orestes, Tisamenus, Pentibilus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginning with Eurystheus: and ending with Pentibilus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclide returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitfull vallies: and in haruest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew vp: couering the fields as thicke as grasse-hoppers: which sterility lasted many years.

Ind. 6. 7. 9.

Ind. 5. 6. 8. 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Toab, afterward called Ierubbaal: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts: Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noyse, and seeing (at the cracke of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appeasing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with traualle, and weary euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had faued themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes and Briers, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, & in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, & were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow in the warre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious heartscanner be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Esse, as it is thought.
Ind. 8. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoener it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the vtremost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: so hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he rooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this merueilous victory, he rooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiuing no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to

to that which hath beene said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are neuer left vn-satisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Aimelec. The like Analegie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their own first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

Intend so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignty ouer them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childre reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden eare-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vied to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because he conuerted that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silke, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set vp the same in his owne Citie of Shiloh, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vied, and so did David when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet yong, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuit, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtalie, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon, Egeus, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristheus King of Mycene: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus, the Kingdome of Mycene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in ielousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not vnreuenged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Atalys, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting herselfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnusall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; so of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appeares by those verses of Mariall, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iunctani Pasiphaen Dicto credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec semiratur Caesar, longæua vetustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, S. viii. makes a lesse vn-honest construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enricing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begather with childe, and that the being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discouered, and Dadalus appointed to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dadalus framed sailes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he outwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was to ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamaris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Againe, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue bene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Cirinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccosable mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her owne troupe she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He posselt himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus releas'd, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Libya, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Libya: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expounding to be a suble Sophister.

§. V I. Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

About the eleuenth yeere of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses haue bene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Jason, who was Jason's father, reigning in Iolcus a town of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing hee were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heede: to which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Tiphis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telamon and Peleus, sonnes of Aacus, and fathers of Aiax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Ascalaphus and Talmenus or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lyncus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dodona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lenmus; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to leade an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary windes backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blowes, inasmuch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they tollemized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Mysia, called Cius, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Mysia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebyrces, the ancient inhabitants of the Countrey, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at wholebats, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebyrces in reuenge of his death slew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmis, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Hurpyes. The Hurpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long clawes, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Hurpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be cottered, and meat set on, which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Hurpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged yong men saw this, they drew their swords, & pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Hurpyes and the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Hurpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to aduenture after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so; & perceiving that the pigeon had onely lost a piece of her tale, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poepe was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the riuer Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Sooth-sayer of their company was slain by a wilde boare; also here Typhis died: and Ancus vndertook to steare the ship. So they passed by the riuer Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, and came to the riuer Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchos. When they were entred the haue, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchos, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his comming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if hee alone would yooke together two brazen hooft buls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragons teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These buls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexity about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aetes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuile to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith the bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserue him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconuenience, she bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, wherupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, he againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that he deuided how to destroy the Argonautes, and burne their ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abysrus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceiued to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word signifieth Diuision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italic.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Abysonia, and were clesed by Circe, from the murder of Abysrus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Aea, wherein Circe dwells, who clesed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. Once Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Zylisum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoake. But Theseus and the Nereides, conuayed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie, where the beues of the Sunne were, and touched at Corcyra, the Iland of the Phaeac, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchos, that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountains of Coreyra, others in the Ilands Abysrides, and some comming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answere, that if she were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchos not daring to returne home, stayed with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Minos reigned, who had a man of brasie giuen to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was clofed vp with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome wasto runne thrice a day about the Iland for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall; she drew out the naile that stoped his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Palaen, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Sigina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Sigina they sailed by Euboea and Locris home to Iolcos, where they arriued, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Iason vnderstand the myserie of the Philosophers story, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelue labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmured. Others would signifie by Iason, wildome, and moderation, which ouer-commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeede to rob Colchos, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world, and the people there inhabiting vie to set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents, in the passage betwene Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery buls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasie, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poeticall morals: all which *Hom*er afterward vied (the man of brasie excepted) in the description of Vheser his trauailes, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythae, and of Theseus, Hyppolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his heir perpetuall Princes, and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe; who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loofe and desperate vagabounds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition: a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for eueralasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourerth the preferment of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth; and with loue that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane so euer) which may serue it: remembering nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alleadge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnderakers, and rather praiseth the aduenture than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient then man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded to his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as besittng euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the yongest of Gideons sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had no power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its farnesse, the Figgetree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraignie. He also foretold them by a Prophetical spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without righted on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman, and finding himselfe mortally brused, he commanded his owne page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Government, the Lapithæ and Centaures made war against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuided to mannage horses, to bridle and to fit them: in somuch as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Lair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seemes to be descended of Lair the sonne of Munasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Hanoth Lair. For to this Lair there remained thirtie of those Cities, which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Lair iudged Israel, Priamus began to reigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ransom, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy; and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cissus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fiftie sonnes, whereof seauenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helen the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Lair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Ethra: but Plutark in the storie of his life finds him begotten by Ageus, of whom the Græcian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forst them to pay him him seuen of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he began on Pasiphæ the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that flauerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing posselt himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a bortome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Ageus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, he should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ageus descrying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile; did cast himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Ægeum.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Sciron, who kept a passage betwene Mezara and the Peloponnejian Sitimos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vied by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Country of Procrustes, who vied to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did hee root out Periphetes and other mischieuous theues and murderers. Hee overthrow the armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vassations, entered the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, began on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phædra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phædra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is fained, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea-Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderdetermined destinie, when Phædra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is fained, that Diana entreated Asculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie, to accompanie her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted therat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Asculapius, to wit, some skilfull Physician, or Chirurgion healed againe; after which he passed into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vaste places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beasts, birds, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Græcian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being disperfed in thinnne and ragged villages: in recompence whereof, and for deuising them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the begerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice so of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when she was fiftie yeers old, from Aphidia, which Citie Castor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Eratistratus and Paulanias write that Theseus begot her with childe at Argos, where the erected Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that tale vnlikely to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Non tamen ex factu fructum tulit ille petitum, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Lair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succceeded Iephth or Iephte fixe yeeres, to whom Isaiah who ruled seuen yeeres, and then Habdon eight yeeres: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Lair, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yceres old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) she was then at least two and fifty yceres old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yere of Demophon King of Athens, the successor of Mnestheus, the successor of Theseus, seuentene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians cruiged the Hellepont into Tirace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yere, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, that when 10 Polyphides gouerned Sicyon, Mnestheus Athens, Tautanes Assyria, Haddon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and heereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phaeus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yceres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adrastrus, who reigned foure yceres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iai, so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atræus, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Assyria, during the gouernment of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitrus and after him Tautanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramses, and afterwards 20 Annemenes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truelie against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiectiō.

*Sic nulla fuit gemalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troia,
Non alias alij quoque rescemere potes?*

If all this world had no original,
But things haue euer bene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased up from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercoure they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sow more come than was necessary for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armor of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeces, and the copper armour of Dimites worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vniuersall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall Citie in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Peloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietness within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easly appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath writen to this effect, in the praeface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times times, idle Chroniclers vie when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to read: so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the brieue whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing bene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grievous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne 10 one yere, and the other another yere; and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeres gouernment resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Heereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastrus the sonne of Talaas then reigned, vnto whose palace coming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-houle, on the backside.

Then he met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calydon: with whom situing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastrus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which he was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deiippe vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as he could draw to follow him, he was defirous among others to carrie Amphiaras the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaras, who is saide to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastrus, did both vterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaras, offering vnto 40 her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiaras and Adrastrus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, cyther of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to force than auoide destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to fullage, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the 50 Thebans.

Now had Adrastrus assembled all his forces, of which, the seuen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiaras, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Mecistius) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopeus the Aradian sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Armie came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; she hauing a child in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Eriphyle the daughter of Thous the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Ile slew all the the males by conspiracie, intending to leade an Amazonian life. For such her piecie, the Lemnian wines did sell her to Pyrrates, and the Pyrrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When vpon the childes death shee hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the childe, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with wholebrats, Amphiarus at running and quoiting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. 10 There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltes, a Lacedaemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is heere set downe.

From Nemea the Argiues marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Conventions betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolu'd to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Theban, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuy and malice of the people, who laid spite men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the Citie as a reporter and witnesse of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolu'd Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster vp more than a thousand then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchasis, Parthenopaus at Eleictis, and Polynices at Hypsisia. In the meane season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, tooke aduise of Teseus the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, 30 if Menaeus the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Dinell, and so enuious at his Creatours glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our childer vnto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gallies, Germanes, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in dealing the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Country rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africk, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue bene practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarities then reigning in Greece. For Menaeus, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then 40 was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as Writers haue it) was stricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Atracus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of

of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue beene so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Menalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which he cruellly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

10 The host of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fledde: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue bene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carkasses, or drowned in the river: and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens, where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to bee buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to *Creon*s Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie vnder the Conduct of Teseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Enadne the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Capitaines which were slaine at Thebes; that any less reuenge should bee taken of their fathers death, then the ruine of the Citie: wherefore 20 tenn yeere after hauing leui'd forces, Agileus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sibonellus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Eurypius of Menalippus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmeon the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory if Alcmeon 30 were their Capitaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incourted by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Agileus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to flee, or according to Apollodorus slain by Alcmeon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselves with their wiues & childer away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, til at length they built the Towne called Ectipia. The Argiues, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; 40 howbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was saued by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there reigne ouer them. That he saued the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred yeeres which he speaketh of, Iud. i. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. i. 3. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

50 After the death of Jair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, & during whose government, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace & in order) they were euolted again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adioyning, and imbraced the idolls of the Aramities, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramities, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered 100 vpon vpon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seeke Iephtha, whom they had formerly defiled and cast from them, because he was bafe borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuifish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beate them out of the plaines, but forst them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee encountered, comming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and onely desired two moneths time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Bortheus and others proue sufficiently.

Iud. 19.
The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 yeeres, and ended in the yeere of the World 3800. in which yeere Iephtha began, Iud. 11.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephtha's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future ciuilitie, and to the most ignominious slavery that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephtha, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephtha hereupon enforced to defend himselfe against their fury, in the encounter slew of them two and forty thousand, which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephtha, after he had iudged Israel fixe yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Emon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes not Emon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessary vpon the occasion of Iephtha's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Iephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Act. 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Iephtha heere challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Hei, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephtha's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debm, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for a vncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentessimum, ex quo nullus liem ea de re mouerit Israel; So hee speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or wel-nigh the three hundred yeere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephtha naming by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captivity, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephtha forbare to reapeate the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonite should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for prescription, hee committed the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeeres more, and someth vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giues to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eightene yeeres to Iosua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melancthon 22. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee adde them to the 266. yeeres of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, wee haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephtha should leaue out more then halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephtha, to be 306. which odd yeeres, saith hee, Iephtha omitteeth. But because the yeeres of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306: but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, to which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth, of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon vnto Iabok, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam; Because Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephtha answereth also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Arer & in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recover them in that space? for this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to posselt it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we doe not vie to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Lutius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephtha's narration: when hee makes a brieue repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeeres (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not onely the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text and Iephtha's owne words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephthas account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue beene signified. For first, touching Iephtha's three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Og had dispossest Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephtha might say that they had posselt those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their owne possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed in this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Erasmus Krentzheimius, and Beza) for Luther haunot read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeeres of Hei, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approue the times from the progression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King. 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Hei, and leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee came vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as (shall bee hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosoi, for Tricacosoi; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, hee takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit: of the Iudges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers, 111. Thereason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because hee thinks that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Iudges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, hee findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue bene spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Casban, or the election of Othniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Iudges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of Iofua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lued Iofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which makes before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (whenthey reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Iudges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppressionall of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to bee the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, viced the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betwene Iofua and Othniel. For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Iudges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and reade with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it bee received fortune that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: And hee destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse hee speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse hee commeth vnto the acts of Iofua; which were, that hee destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Iudges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so far as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that it seemes irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betwene the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres betwene the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Codoman

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othniels gouernment; from whence if wee cast the yeeres of the Iudges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith hee) that the annus egressions, 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressio non incipientis sed finis, the yeere of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Egypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was digged backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it seemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Ennius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that heerein he doth well, why may not we also, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

20 The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said notto haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephia, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to Iud. 18. this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that wee should suppose that Othniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue bene dead, or at least, as Gideon did, hee might haue refused all souerainety, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in itselfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwife found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Lais, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othniel? Or what other probability hath hee than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to haue bene, when Israel came out of Egypt; likewise say that King Edward the first was crowned when hee came out of the holie Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place eyther whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or faith by conuening the proposition; when Jordan was turning backe, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeede most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arriual out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, and died at Carlisle. How may wee then beleue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land, (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, seruing as the onely guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from from that illustrious deliuerance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, wherof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed, but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein hee sheweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne and beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wilderness, wherof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleuen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is not a worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expressly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but mistaken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evidently his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betwene Saul and Samuel; yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how soeuer they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the general opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe where the need is not ouer great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example: The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Beroaldus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therefore disioynes the members to make the account euert. In so doing he dalsteth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answere, That Othomiel could not gouerne about 25. yeeres, because then was the taking of Laiſa, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the Danites must needs haue taken Laiſa at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might bee termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himselfe should haue spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our storie. To the time of Iephia are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Iscan: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greekes had fixt yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, longa paratio belli celerem offert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greekes consumed tenne yeeres in the attempt; and Troy, as it seemes, was entered, sacke and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixt yeere of Habdon, Aeneas arriued in Italy. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.)ooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Lair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Iephia, for not calling them to War ouer Jordan; if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being ouertrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward; or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betwene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue observed Historical truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather chosse here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuersitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanius were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reinercius thinks)ooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Amnius borrowed it of him, then it rests vpon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

*Creta Iouis magni medio iacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idaus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostrae.*

*Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus vnde Pater (sic ite audita recorder)
Teucus Rheaeus primum est aduectus ad oras:
Optantique locum regno. Nondum illum ex arces

Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiæq; ara,

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Ioue was borne, thence is our prognie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundredth great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhecean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilium was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybele rites were bought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gave name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graui cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; ubere glebae,
Oenotrii coluere viros: nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iasusq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
Oenotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

Also Aenid.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus ut agria
Dardanus Idæas Phrygia penetravit ad vrbes, Threiciamq; Samum, qua nunc Samothrace fertur.
Hinc illum Coryii Thyrrhena ab sede profectum, Aures nunc solio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Aruncans, I remember well, (Though time haue made the same obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did faile to Samothrace;
But now intronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names Troes, Teucus, and Thracæ, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Laphet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, &c. Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Askenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Riuer of Ascania in Asia tooke name. That Askenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascani, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewd) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom the bare Iasius. Annus out of his Perofus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annus of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it must haue bene of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often bene said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedegree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Atlas

Concerning the beginning and continuance, the Trojan Kingdome, with the length of every Kings reigne, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greekes, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that Citie while it stood, it is reckoned by Diadorus Diad. l. 4. to be 780. yeeres more ancient than the beginning of the ninthie fourth Olympiad, where as therefore 372. did passe betweene the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first yeere of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. yeeres, that is, 408. yeeres went betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authoritie of Diadorus be good proofe, who elsewhere tels vs, that the returne of the Heracleide, which was 80. yeeres after the fall of Troy, was 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad.

Hereunto agrees the authoritie of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, four and twentie yeeres after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in express words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. yeeres later then the destruction of Troy. The summe is easily collected by neede, in inference out of diuers other places in the same booke. Hereunto doth Eusebius reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratothenes, (as he is cited by Clement Alexandrinus) makes vp out of many particulars, the same totall summe, wanting but one yeere, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other collections of diuers Writers that are cited by Clement in the same place, doe neither cohere any way, nor depend vpon any collateral Historie, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the yeere before the Olympiads foure hundred and eight: we must seeke the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leads vs from Dardanus on-wards through the reignes of foure Kings, by the space of two hundred and fife and twenty yeeres, and after of Priamus, with whom 30 also at length it ended. As for the time which passed vnder Laomedon, we are faine to doe, as others haue done before vs, and take it vpon trust from Annius his Authors, believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reignes, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may giue vs leaue to thinke that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we neede not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no Historie or account of time depends vpon the reignes of the former Kings, but onely vpon the ruine of the Citie vnder Priamus, it may suffice that we are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due yeere.

True it is, that some obiections appearing waightie, may be alleged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to 40 dispute of those yeeres, wherein the Greekes knew no good forme of a yeere, but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprize that was vnder-taken by generall consent of all Greeces, was the last warre of Troy, which hath bene famous euento this day, for the numbers of Princes, and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great battailes fought with variable success: the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countreies, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greekes after their vnsfortunate returne. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, haue bene deliuered vnto posteritie, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poemes of that great Homere, whose verses haue giuen immortallitie to the action, which might else perhaps haue bene buried in oblivion, among other worthy deedes, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith;

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illachrymabiles Videntur, ignota, longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many

Many by valour haue deferu'd renowne
 Ere Agamemnon: yet lye all opprest
 Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vnderakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profitand delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes: but how he was herunto emboldened it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phenicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like, not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phenicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phenicians? Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vied at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to thinke, that they should haue fought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue beene true. For Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruel man, seeing his owne sonne Tenear durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Tenear could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione: but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians; and Barbarians from Greekes, as Herodotus discoureteth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stolen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabit neere vnto the Sea, for feare of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choyse of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in mony, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greece Princes brought to that expedition.

This did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks, onely they vied as Thucydides saith (small ships, meete for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazones also brought their succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke, out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Gracians iourney, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenes being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made herunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helen, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answered, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeede she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before hee returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleueed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the faying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vicer madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had bene rauished by Thesus, the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twins) who sailed with the Argonauts, hauing Telamon the father of A-10 iax in their companie before the time that Helen was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bene a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines and all the Hoste with many troublesome answers and diuinations. For he would haue *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the yong Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hinde, it is not needefull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awais for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phenix; Aiax and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilocheus, and Thrasymedes; Vlysses, Meneleus the sonne of Petrou, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the sonne of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Ialmennus, the sonnes of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the sonne of Peas, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the sonne of Oileus, Penelcus, Thas, Eumelus, Tyandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the sonne of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machaon, the sonnes of Ascalapius; Epeus, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of the Grecians at the siege.

Here, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the war would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Pyrotesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: saue only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the finalnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherroneffe: otherto rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the war protracted nine whole yeeres, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receive little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ouid saith, that from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commendes as very credible, the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not ly before Troy the first nine yeeres: but only did beate vp and downe the lesse, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by waisting the enemies Country, did blocke vp the towne, vnto which they returned not, vntill the fatal time drew neere when it should be subuerted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue bene supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in waisting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and llands waisted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was imployed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoeuer it was, this is agreed by generall consenr, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ranfome: but Strabellus interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised pestilent fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish peece of ground. And it might well be that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Genorall, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aiax, Vlysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollis Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had bene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Vlysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwile than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greekes encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer;) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well guesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greekes, when they waisted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the towne, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helonus, and the other sonnes of Priamus: Aneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glauces, Asius, and the sonnes of Pantheus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall; Menon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Between these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aiax, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, repelled repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, hauing slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his body, not restoring it without rancome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Captaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their Iauelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with swords and batrel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defensiue were helmets, breast-plates, bootes of brasse or other metall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensiue were swords and batrel-axes at hand, and stones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heauiest: also that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captaine whom he had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next batrell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeued) he chased three times about the wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the riuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians, perceiuing Hector in such an extremity, would haue forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great rancome. But his cruelty and couetousnesse were not long vnreueged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polixena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren; and his body was rancommed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-same rate that Hector was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe-giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Columns of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Astus and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well be that with some woooden engine, which they called an Horse, they eiesied did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a woooden horse, it had bene a desperate aduenture, and seruing to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the decceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon: or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlkely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it:) by which means they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by sitting forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needelesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

Iohn Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discouering of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a woooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the towne then sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Græcians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them writtē, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report; had it not bene that either those bookes were euē in those times thought triuolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to haue bene about 600000. on the Troian side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report merely fabulous; for as much as the whole fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greeke seas, not much about 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deedes of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnefseus the sonne of Petens had shewed, in marshalling the Græcians army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had bene a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirall of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeede, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Aneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. V. I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Oncerning the Greekes, they tasted as much misery as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the So- ueraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue beene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus, and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgil tels, were driven soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Agyllus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandering long vpon the Seas, came into Agypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Phyllis, after ten yeeres, having lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recouering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to seek new habitations.

Aias the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Tenues fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Damius, who was Lord of the Lapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Affricke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the ware of Troy, were wont to call it; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the overthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

THE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not neede to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that storie. First, that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Manah the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to eat any vncleane meate, after shee was conceived with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himselfe, and deliuered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinke, nor meate, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinke farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wifes, to wit, by their importunity and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit; Whom no force could overmaster, Voluptas posse evertit.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giuen them a great overthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vying these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over 20. yrs. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them an other overthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Assle.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca, Patientia saepe laesa vertitur in furor. Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken; and of Dagon's fall, and the sending back of the Arke.

THE storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; 40 of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successiually in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fifth, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixth, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lyranus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceined. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimias and their successors. The Arke 50 of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon, the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would have observed his Lawes, and ferued him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Macchabees: and yet for their picie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that garded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; Dauid witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; he forbade it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, vjing these words: If I shall finde fauour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer be ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatal battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made beleue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died; and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrysostome vpon Saint Matthew (if that be his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that wore a part of Saint Johns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatiue: Si tibi ca non profuit in auribus, quomodo proderunt in Colla? If those words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reuerence of the Father, that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the 20 other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glory which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboute to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the diuell inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure 30 the representation of the true God, it is not to be marauiled, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely Begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had never beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining vpon the earth which had bin long obscured by Idolatry, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he starcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivulous. For not onely this old Diuell did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole 40 rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victory, God strooke them with the grievous disease of the Hamorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered, that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Gez another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekron 50 or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be flaine thereby: For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolute to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, &c. that their owne Idols were subiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vjing these words; So ye shall giue glorie to the God of Israel, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle: Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius; when they had seene his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being embraced, and the golden Hamorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not bene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to be framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make triall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolute that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their Calues, but that they would haue followed them wheresoeuer, much lesse when they were left to themselves would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if Calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Ismael of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had bene taught accordingly: he strook them more grievously then he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and fourtie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeers in the charge of Eliab his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Gad-gala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time ferued from the Arke: or at least it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim.

§. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Government.

These Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheth, and Merari: Cheth had Amram, and Leazar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Leazar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Eliab was a Leuite, was called an Ephraimite, not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauids father was called an Ephraimite, because borne at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiply as the Starres of Heauen, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the fourth; There shall bee neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which the deliuered him euen from the dugges. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five yeeres old for five sheekles, and betwene five yeeres add twentie for twentie sheekles: so it was not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should bee called to seruice about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty yeeres.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was giuen, and yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise vp unto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answer

Which region was called Ephrata, as Josephus saith, Indica, Gen. 35. 19. From the region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Ephraim is put for Sib, which was in the Tribe of Ephraim.

answer of God, thus he spake : Come and let us goe to the Seer : for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob ; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision ; not that God had altogether with-drawn his grace from Israel : but as the Childean Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Maispa or Mispa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Iuda : also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mispa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie : at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them ; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophesie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall be thunder upon them, &c. Iosephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake : and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God ; which Iosephus called, Lapidem iurum : Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance : and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any insuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be assailed from diuers parts at once ; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turns, as hath bene elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI.

OF SAUL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

VT when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that he was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so careful a government, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beerseba, a Citie the very vtmost towards the South of Iudea. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the iustice and vertue of their Father : For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine, to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapman. Which so when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were ; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeelde fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a caule of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God : which Iudely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes ; who being as they were, God would not haue approoued his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, heeued his best arguments to dehort them : which when he perceived to be ouer-faible, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is to still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vnder his sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men ; which is not only not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition, desired : it being very agreeable to subiects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto breed and brought vp : so are likewise the offices of women seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and giue them to his seruants ; with other oppressions ; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination confuteth this Text faire otherwise, as teaching vs what Subiects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand.

The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Iudges to Kings ; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like : hee commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written : and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life : that he may learn to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them : that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is just and right shall thou follow, that thou mayest Deut. 16.

Now if it be not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God : it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard itselfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that : but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes : and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money which he refused : yet because hee was falsly accused, and vniuistly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe : Posuisti me in caput gentium : For this of S. Augustine is very true : Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia : simulata aquitas non est aquitas : sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas, & simulatio. Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other : but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all, being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treasurie may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to inferre. Onely thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greameste of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoeuer they pleased in the

the greatest things, and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Nriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receiue this change of government, it was not onely fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not need to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colouts already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges every man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan; the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Ierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be deered from the finnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed; insinuating vpon this point, that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II. Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Sephim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandered diuers daies to seeke his fathers asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant travelled towards Ramath, to finde a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to elect Saul, who fought an Assie, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Zethro; and after to make choise of Dauid the yongest of eight finnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Jacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerslasting in Gods euerslasting Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom hee expected, and stayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had fore-told him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel sitting him according to his degree, about all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should incounter him by Rahels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men inuited with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, & after them Gad, Nathan, Ahiah, Elias, Elisha, Isay, Ieremie, and theret; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praeterita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 14. 14. who inuined with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpah Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpah, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbit thinks by the answer of  Vrim* and  Thumim*: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that myserie vpon his brest, when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plinius, Pausanias, and others haue remembered diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Graecians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two first kinds were called diuiniurie; the third, diuinatory; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howeouer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, But the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort: fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confers it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller then all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, tooke no notice.

§. III. Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

Sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee receiued knowledge that Nahash King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which Nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt anie thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their intiation in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had used great care and policie that they should haue no Smithies to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euē occasion it selfe inuited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likelie to haue beene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time bene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should beverly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath bene spoken: Saul, both to value himselfe in his first yeeres reigne, and because perchance hee was defended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, heuing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protelling thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven daies to giue Nabab the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue leuied themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezer, neere Jordan, that he might readily passe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hee returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nabab the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might set on them on all sides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troupe enforced them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resited their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

After the Armie removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vied an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a re-hearfall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, hee threatened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his final reiection.

In Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to haue bene Cariatih-icaron: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariatih-icaron: but Jonathan vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gibeah in Beniamin neere Gibea, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers: Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines; others fledde ouer Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, hid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of israa when he led Israel ouer Jordan. Heere Saul, by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him; and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word gibulitis, in this place; by gibulitis per Sacerdotem, as to make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him hee could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, hee was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes vnsuited his estate, had not extraordinary warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe: at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smyles in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armor as they had, behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now bene any iron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such as were serued for the Plough, and for nought else; yet that they had some kind of armes is manifest, or else they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not laid in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel; but onely that there was not any found among those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troupe he held himselfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, and better assured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had bene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no maruell if they could not in a short space vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philistims was to bee vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vsē after his Conquest in Indaa: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites excelled in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag. That they were to weaponed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Ionathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he was discouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of denision called vpon by his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and iealetie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoyled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that prophetic in Dentonomie fulfilled by Ionathan. That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and smite them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the eueniing, yet his sonne Ionathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemed to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waisting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert belonging to the Amalekites, from Haurilab towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt; in which waile he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Aegypt in Moses time: hee notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but refused the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all more excusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearyed, faint, sick, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation about 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many bootlesse inuents perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilead, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, untill the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrences betweene the reuelion of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to chooe a King for Israel, among the Ionnes of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome, hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisedome or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who inade and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the Ionnes of Israh, Samuel by God directed, made choice of Dauid, the yongest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other five brethren, made choice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocke, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoyne him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neyther was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody minde he continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often inured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equal, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former war, had for the most part bene agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them; that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battell, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betwene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene soundly by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heauen were to bee feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as overcome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe

to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill David (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Heereupon the Philistims, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded fild without stay, and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not broken, that cyther any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the greivous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deseruing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon David, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Ahimelch fedde David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliath, Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Dag murdered this Ahimelch and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and made with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattel, contrarie to the Commandment and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Ionathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when David had twice spared his life in the Territorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neereft and faithful seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Giftedites of Iabes stolne their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites, and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul, of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heracidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David borne: after Codemann later, and in the ninth yeere: after Banring in the tenth. For David, faith hee, was thirty yeres old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the 11. yeere of Samuel, Veneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirty yeres. There are who place before him Latinus Sylvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Veneas, and fourth King of Alba, wherof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilus late in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King, he ruled that Empire fortie yeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heracidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, possed a great part thereof 328. yeres before the first Olympiads, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellen, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Ethiopia in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euerie seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned ouer it. And because this is the firstest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, cyther because the names of his Parents; had in the Greece tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrrha. Deucalion & his wife Pyrrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrrha the Regene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Boeotia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward seate themselves about Paralus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerced from them to his owne vic some part of their Fathers goods, came to Aethiops: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichtheus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) hee afterwards departed, and leuying an Armie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grand-father in Thessalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solimus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wives name in Aegialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But once-coming the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouer-coming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Heereupon the Achai driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Ionians desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and alleading in vaine, that Ion and Achaeus had bene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the sonne of Oricles in that Warre.

This were the Ionians driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remooue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionians into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeres after the descent of the Heracidae into Peloponnesus. These Heracidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeres. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must be allegorically vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxen-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Symphalis: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The threelast was, to fetch Gerion Beecus from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Summe, and his traualles to bee the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as cyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His traualles through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurythius. This Eurythius was sonne of Stenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycene, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnes he had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurythius for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ialousie by Eurythius because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein he was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiuues and Concubines about threescore children. These children Eurythius would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Cepheus King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurythius) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountered Eurythius Iolus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclidae. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leaue of Plato to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurythius: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to mee, that whereas he had ledde Colomes into Scitie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurythius was slaine, they tooke Areus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidae marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeates a people of Arcadie; who assisted Areus, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enioy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidae should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heraclidae compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue liued, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achaes, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurythius foure generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Macons, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anameon, who gaue name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Ara according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seauen more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, spring the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the nature Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Israel, and Numa of Rome. He was called Meligenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homo: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. Clemens Alexandrinus receives many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also Anulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oracion ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinius: which Morator catcheth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres, and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome; making him to haue flourished about the time of Ithobaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus about named, mention authors that make him much antienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of antient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratosthenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the amie of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Cyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sofibus saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colomes in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he liued while Agefilus gouerned Lacedaemon; and that Lycurgus in his young yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Gracians: which Bernaldus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Eusebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of the King of India, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, he reckoneth many other Gruke writers more antient than Homer: as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristeus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyris, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Anulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vn certaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, where- in he confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siling reigned in Alba, about 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. Euthymus findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acisius the sonne of Pelias, King of Thessaly.

of Theſſaly. For my ſelfe, I am not much troubled when his Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with theſe opinions, but onely to ſhew the vncertainty and diſagreement of Hiſtorians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and diſpute of time. For the curioſitie of this mans age is no leſſe ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing ſome great myſterie. In diſſon whereof Lucian ſaining himſelfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to doe.

It ſeemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius, Senemires, ruled Ægypt at this time: for Tanphers ſon, who preceded Paphres, ſatther in law to Salomon.

Enſup Caſſ. in Chron.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Aſia, Eatinus Syluius then ruling in Italia. And beſides the overthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103 years before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reaſon of thoſe Northerne Nations: but there ſprung vp ſomewhat neerer together, ſix Kingdomes into greatneſſe not before erected. In Italia, that of the Latins in the South part of Greece, thoſe of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria, St. ba, and Damaſcus, the Adams made themſelves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Iſrael in effect: and ſomewhat before theſe, the State of the Iſraelites hauing now altered the forme of Government, began to flouriſh vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few years, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring Nations who by interchange of times had ſubiected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a moſt abiect and grievous ſlaueerie; to wit, the Edumæans, Mobabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Iſturæans, and the reſt of the Arabians, with the Philiftims, Iebusites, Getherites, Machabites, all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

§. I.

Of Dauids eſtate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely deſigned King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The firſt perſonall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became knowne to Saul, and ſo highly affected Jonathan the ſonne of Saul, that he loved him as his owne ſoule: In ſomuch as when Saul ſought to perſwade his ſon, that Dauid would aſſuredly be the ruine of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe, Jonathan could neuer be perſwaded, neuer forſake, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this ſignall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he became as his houſhold ſervant, and his Elquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill ſpirit, was adduiced to procure ſome cunning Muſician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde eaſe, which came to paſſe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpoſe, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant ſoone waxed wearie of his good affection, and fought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the middeſt of his raving fit, at which time he threw aſpeare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him eaſe.

Conſonius rememb. 1. 2. 1. 2.

Conſonius remembreth one Aclepius a Physician, who practiſed the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Muſicke: and tempered thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witneſſeth. But the madneſſe of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes, and and was thereby incurable, howſoeuer it ſometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Muſicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in ſuch open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000. ſouldiers, to confront the Philiftims withall. For hee durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiftims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation,) that the Philiftims would take Dauids head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill frustrated. After all this he fought to murder him in his owne houſe, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achi the Philiftim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelfe, he was ſet to counterfeit both ſimplicie and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiftims, he couered himſelfe in the Cave of Adullam: and after conuincing ſuch of his kinſfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelfe in the deſerts of Ziph, Maon and the hils of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſert of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achi of Geth the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his maſter Saul was knowne to proſecure him.

Of Achi Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Iudea: but he bent his forces another way and ſtrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achi ſuppoſing that Dauid had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himſelfe aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoneth Dauid to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiftim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and aſſurance to recover all againe: which he did.

This arme of the Philiftims commanded by Achi, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſonnes were ſlaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the ſame Nation, who auowed (though falſly) that himſelfe at Sauls request had ſlaine him. Dauid, becauſe he had accuſed himſelfe, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlaine at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gaue ſtrong evidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleued of himſelfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confefſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoscentis. The priſoners confeſſion muſt not be taken for an evidence of the crime, vnleſſe ſome other proofe informeth the conſcience of the Iudge. For a man may confeſſe thoſe things of himſelfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de penis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in iudicio poſt de ſeipſo confeſſus, & poſtea maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis. If any man in iudgement doe confeſſe of himſelfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perſeuer in his confeſſion, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that beſell him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre vp ſorrow, and moue compaſſion in the heart of Dauid.

The victories which the Philiftims had gotten was ſo great, that ſome townes of the Iſraelites, euen beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemies, who tooke poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeeme ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiftims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both : and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation ; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Isbosus, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Stephobeth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and crossed the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few ; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedamonians, and the Argives, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were only left vnslaine. The like triall in a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom Dauid slew : a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King ; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda : whose force and valor was so equall, as there followed not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here : for the army of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Iuda: whereof Asabel the brother of Joab was one : who when he would needes pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroke of his speare. For though Asabel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde doe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses ; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who, as Asabel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, that the race is not to the swift.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, we finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter ; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer ; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew iualousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine : neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow ; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

After, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Joab murdered ; for Joab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandement of his forces, by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbore to call him to account ; for thus much he confideth of himselfe : I am this day weak, and these men of the house of Zeruah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death ; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publicke imprecation ; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house : and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosie, to lamenesse, to the sword, and to pueritie, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly haue endangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to giue them great respect, as hath beene already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in kindred, and had bene partaker of all his aduersitie ; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indee he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his owne kinsman and the Kings ; vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joyned with himselfe as captain of the hoste of Iuda : much lesse could hee brooke a superior, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Joab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man fallen before wicked men, so (said he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possit with great feare : inasmuch as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to Dauid, receiued the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, which was ouerthrowne giuen to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

When Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie ; which Dauid soone after entered : all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) he became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise : Braxatibnis take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Iebusites : others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Isaac, and Iacob : the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Iosua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now possit himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre : he entertained diuers other concubines and married more wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had sixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistines hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as well of Iuda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his seat. And being encountered by Dauid at two severall times in the Valley of Kezaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Uzzab the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were wih intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musike, dances, and all signes of ioyfullnesse, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Mitchel derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behauiour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that he disliked Dauids behauiour (as I take it) though he made it the colour of her derision, but rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, our of whose ruines he conceived that the sonne of Israhel had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull teares, for which she remained barren to her death.

8 Chron. c. v. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made were iust, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terror of their warres, to make themselves ingreatesse like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Dauids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the everlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1.

SOON after this David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israhel in haste. For it is thus written, Acceptis fructum Amgaris de manu Philisthorum; which place our English Genea conuers in these words, And David tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense, for by that of the bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genea hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dica-Carus, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Iudas and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and therainto their retreat in all their inuasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gath is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Hinc in 8. v. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and villages of that kinde, but inforced them to come downe into their territories, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israhelites till this time of David were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

8 Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arahians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheeles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of four poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Countessors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Israhel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gath, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie he sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabbins saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israhel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also rememberd that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israhel not to seeke the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadazer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadazer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadazer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppressed by Hadadazer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprise towards Euphrates, he was in so farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadazer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his prouisions through those vncultivated places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we finde that David returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as before is said.

The king of Syria Damasena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadazer was ouerthrowne by the Israhelites, fearing his owne estate, and the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zoba of Hadadazer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadazer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (our of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sacked the adioyning cities of Beiah and Berath, belonging to Adadazer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betah, Taubat, and Berath he nameth Barathena. Tobu or Thoi whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadazer is in the description of the Holy Land the reader may perceiue; for his sonne Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had ware with Adadazer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words: elypeos aureos by ambones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Sepuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasie in place of these of Adadazer, at such times as Shicab the Egyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

2 Sam. 1.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hanum King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nabab, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-icalous of his estate, vied Dauids messengers to so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Maachab the North part of Transpar (re-embred in Deut. 3. 14.) Israhel or Tab a country neere God vnder the rocks of Armon. 2 Sam. 10.
